When asked about reported shortages in equipment supplied to IDF forces, Olmert was defensive. "It's not the job of the prime minister to think about how many vests there are in storage."

Concerning the Palestinian issue, Olmert said the peace process is "by no means dead," adding, "All the time, we are in contact with the Palestinians."

On the Iranian threat, Olmert said the danger must not be taken lightly.

"The threat from Iran is a threat which one must not for a moment take lightly. We are occupied with it unceasingly," he said.

Olmert said that while Israel can defend itself, he hoped the international community would be able to keep Iran in line. "I am convinced that the international effort, led by the United States, will lead to the required results."

IDF developing measures to counter Iran's threat

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — With Iran racing to obtain nuclear weapons, the Israel Defence Forces Home Front Command (HFC) has shifted its focus since the war in Lebanon and is now investing most of its efforts in confronting the threat of non-conventional weapons of mass destruction (WMD), a high-ranking officer revealed last week.

The officer said the HFC was in the process of developing new technological means to deal with chemical and biological threats. The Jerusalem Post has learned that the HFC was in the process of developing mobile air-purification containers that could be brought to areas infected by chemical or biological weapons and purify the air.

According to an officer involved in the development, the containers would minimize the number of dead and wounded during a chemical attack since they would quickly purify air infected by deadly chemical agents.

Part of the reason for the shift in the HFC's focus was due to the defence establishment's realization that following the war in Lebanon – during which close to 4,000 missiles were fired at the north – Israel was facing a major threat from ballistic missiles. Iran has developed the Shihab-3 missile that can reportedly carry a 500- to 650-kilogram warhead and has a range of between 1,550 and 1,620 kilometres.

"As was demonstrated during the war in Lebanon, the other side is investing all of its resources in missiles," a high-ranking Israeli Air Force officer said. "We therefore need to provide answers to deal with this threat offensively but also defensively, once the missiles are already launched."

The growing assessment within the defence establishment is that facing a nuclear Iran, Israel will find itself in a "lose-lose situation," as one senior defense official. "If Iran is attacked, long-range missiles will land in Israel," the official said. "If, on the other hand, nothing is done militarily, Israel will find itself under a constant nuclear threat from Iran."

The Post has further learned that in high-level talks with Israeli officials, senior Egyptian officials close to President Hosni Mubarak have given their discreet support for international efforts to stop Iran's race to obtain nuclear capability.

The Egyptian officials told their Israeli counterparts that according to their estimates, Iran will obtain a nuclear bomb within five years and must be stopped. Unlike Egypt, Israel has said that the point of no return regarding Iran's nuclear program is a few months away and at that point the Islamic republic would have independent research, development know-how and the ability to continue its program without outside help.

While the Egyptians gave their support to Israeli diplomatic efforts to stop Iran, the officials also called for the denuclearization of the entire Middle East. The assumption within the defence establishment is that an Iranian success at developing nuclear weapons would lead to a race among other countries in the region – including Egypt and possibly Saudi Arabia – to also begin their own independent nuclear programs.

Meanwhile, Iran said that reports it was ready to consider temporarily freezing uranium enrichment were "just a misconception," but did not rule out that the proposal was being discussed in negotiations with Europe.

Iran has been largely silent amid signs from European officials of some progress in the crucial talks over Iran's nuclear program. Europeans are seeking a freeze in enrichment to avoid imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran and allow broader negotiations to begin.

Iran's comments did little to clarify its position on the suspension issue.

Meanwhile, a senior Iranian official warned against UN sanctions, saying his country would respond by cutting international inspections of its nuclear program.

Government spokesperson Gholan Hossein Elham said in Tehran that any mention of Iran agreeing to suspend its nuclear program, even temporarily, was "just a misconception." Both sides of the negotiation "have not reached any conclusion in this regard," Elham said.

The Zionist establishment was not eager to advertise the unhappy end that the children of their visionary leader met, and did not press for their burial in Israel. Meanwhile, the Orthodox religious establishment was opposed to bringing their remains to Israel because Hans had violated Jewish law – first by converting to Christianity and later by committing suicide.

Only after Israeli historian Ariel Feldestein pursued the case for six years, after coming across related documents in a brown enveloped marked "Top Secret" at the Central Zionist Archives, did Israeli authorities begin exploring how Herzl's final wishes might be honoured after so many years.

"Why has this not been done before in recent times?" Feldestein asked at a ceremony Sept. 19 in Bordeaux when the coffins were disinterred. "I think it's a question of negligence."

Officials from the Jewish Agency for Israel "came here to Bordeaux in 1949 but decided not to move the coffins. They returned in 1956 and put up a sign marking agency recognition of the coffins, but did not touch them.

"For both occasions, I cannot tell you why no transfer was made," he told JTA.

Feldestein managed to convince Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi, Shlomo Amar, that Hans appeared to have recanted his conversion and might be considered a Jew. Rabbi Amar subsequently wrote a ruling that Hans was a Jew, that his suicide was a result of being mentally unstable and that he should be allowed to be buried in Jerusalem.

"We had the opportunity and we did it, to bring human justice to Herzl," Feldestein said at the ceremony marking their reburial in Jerusalem.

Afterward, talking to reporters, he said times had changed. In 1956, when the state had closed the case on the subject, Israel had "different rabbis and a different generation."

The Herzl siblings' remains were brought to Israel as part of a joint initiative of Olmert and Zeev Bielski, chairman of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency.

Bielski said the mission was an especially moving and essential one, since it made amends for the way the WZO snubbed Herzl's children – and especially Pauline when she was destitute and desperate for funds.

The family had enjoyed a comfortable, bourgeois existence in Vienna and Paris, but by the time he died of heart failure at age 44 in 1904, Herzl had used up his money pursuing the Zionist cause, leaving the family penniless.

The Zionist movement raised money to support the family after Herzl's death, investing the funds in Austro-Hungarian bonds, at the time the safest currency in central Europe. But once World War I broke out, the money was worthless and the family's financial state became precarious.

After Herzl's death, his wife, Julie, spent time in a series of sanatoriums and died three years later, at age 39. According to the most authoritative book written on the family, The Labyrinth of Exile, Julie was cremated, and Hans is said to have left the urn with the ashes on a train.

All three of the Herzl children suffered from varying degrees of mental illness. Their messy personal lives and hardscrabble existences hardly resembled the royal future that Herzl imagined for them.

For the World Zionist Organization that Herzl founded, the children became an embarrassment. WZO offices turned down a request for financial assistance from Pauline. By some accounts, the homeless Pauline may have died of hunger.

Hans, the son Herzl envisioned would one day serve his people as a prince, lived in London and struggled for years to get by, earning a paltry living translating his father's writings.

Battling depression and seeking a feeling of connection, he converted to Christianity in 1924, joining the Baptist Church and then hopping among various denominations. He tried being Catholic and then Protestant, Unitarian and Quaker.

Trude, the Herzls' youngest child and her parents' favorite, was killed in the Nazi concentration camp Theresienstadt. She was likely buried in a mass grave.

Her son, Stephen, the last hope for Herzl's imagined dynasty, also met with a tragic end. He survived the war in England, where he served as a lieutenant in the British army, visited British Mandate Palestine once in 1945 but refused to settle there, and took a diplomatic posting for the British government in Washington.

Two months after hearing of his mother's and father's deaths in Theresienstadt, he committed suicide in November 1946 by jumping off a Washington bridge.

Last week, the bodies of Hans and Pauline were removed from the cemetery in Bordeaux in a ceremony organized by the Jewish Agency's Paris office. It was hailed by Jewish Agency officials, Israeli government representatives and members of the French Jewish community as a historic moment.

"Our community was proud to watch over the graves of Hans and Pauline," said Eric Aouizerate, president of the Consistoire of the Gironde-Bordeaux area. "But now the time has come for them to take their place on Mount Herzl."

Bielski told JTA the idea for the reinterment came about five months ago from Olmert.

"He said, 'Let's bring Herzl's children to Israel,'" so the Jewish Agency "went into action," he said.

Last week, under the shade of a white tent over the graves of Pauline and Hans Herzl, relatives living in Israel took in the scene of politicians, flowered wreaths and television cameras.

"At last they have come here in a respectful way," said Rachel Telmon Herzl, 82, whose grandparents were both cousins of Herzl.

'Aliyah' of a troubled family – the Herzls

By HILLEL HALKIN
Jerusalem Post

Commentary

"Let the dead bury the dead," said Jesus, and that's more or less what Theodor Herzl has managed to do, though it did take some time.

In his will, made public at the time of his death in 1904, Herzl asked to have his three children buried with him when they died, and two of them, Hans and Pauline, finally had their bones exhumed this week from their graves in the Jewish cemetery of Bordeaux and transferred to their father's burial site on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem.

It's a melancholy story, that of the Herzls. Pauline, the eldest, led a psychologically disturbed life, became a morphine addict, wandered in penury from place to place, and was arrested in Bordeaux for vagrancy shortly before, in 1930, she died there of a heart attack at the age of 40.

Hans, a year younger, came to Bordeaux to make the funeral arrangements and complicated them further by shooting himself in his hotel room and asking to be buried in the same coffin as his sister. Lonely, troubled, and penniless like Pauline – he had to borrow the money to travel to Bordeaux from the Zionist Executive in London – he was psychoanalyzed at one point by Karl Jung and at another stage of his life converted to Christianity. Later, he sought to return to Judaism.

As for Trude, Herzl's youngest child, she was a manic-depressive with delusions of grandeur and a long history of psychiatric hospitalizations. She died in a concentration camp in 1942, and her only child, Herzl's one grandchild, having emigrated to England and changed his name from Stephen Theodor Neumann to Stephen Norman, joined the British foreign service and took his own life in Washington, D.C., in 1946.

You might say that the apples didn't fall that far from the tree. Herzl himself, apart from being regularly accused of being a madman by his anti-Zionist detractors, had pronounced manic tendencies, feared more than once that he was about to go mad, and was obsessed by the subject of suicide. His wife, Julie, from whom he was estranged for most of their marriage, was a chronic neurasthenic who repeatedly threatened to kill herself. With such a family history, the similarities among Pauline, Hans, Trude and Stephen Theodor's fates may have, at least partially, a genetic constituent.

But given a hysterical and over-possessive mother who raged against her husband and mocked his Zionism and a megalomaniac father who was rarely home and was too busy being a leader and a visionary to be with his children, who were still young when he died, there's no need to look for the explanations in DNA. Emotionally close to their mother, Pauline, Hans and Trude at the same time couldn't stand her; it was surely not by sheer accident that, after she died and was cremated in 1907, the 17-year-old Hans mistakenly left the urn with her ashes on a train. Emotionally remote from their father, they also admired him and felt compelled to live up to his image; both Hans and Trude had fantasies of themselves as Jewish leaders that were totally out of reality.

Though a source of great embarrassment to the Zionist movement, Hans' conversion to Christianity – which he viewed as a symbolic act showing the way for the restoration of the Jews to the universal brotherhood of mankind – was more inspired by his father than Herzl's followers cared to admit. Not only, after all, had Herzl, in his pre-Zionist stage, been so indifferent to Judaism that he did not bother to have Hans circumcised at birth; not only did he fail to provide Hans with even a symbolic bar mitzvah ceremony; but it was Herzl himself who, in 1893, a scant three years before writing The Jewish State, envisioned the Jewish "problem" being solved by a mass, voluntary conversion to Christianity in a spectacular pageant planned for St. Stephen's Cathedral in Vienna, thus bringing to the world a "message of racial fusion."

Sons sometimes avenge themselves on their fathers by becoming an abandoned part of them. What was Hans' baptism, if not a deliberate act of desecrating his father's memory by acting out precisely what his father had once proposed?

And now their bones are together again. Were there some kind of personal immortality after death, Herzl could perhaps take some comfort in the fact that the children he had so utterly failed to protect while he and they lived from misery, from penury, from madness, from the Nazi concentration camps – were now sheltered in the shadow of his grave.

"Though proud to be a father," writes Herzl's biographer Ernst Pawel, "and ever ready to be maudlin about his children in print or in his letters, he gave them little of his time and even less of himself." Fathers often sacrifice their families for their careers. And yet cannot such men sometimes say in their defence that they were thinking of their families all along, even as they were ignoring them? Might not a Jewish state, had only it come sooner, given Pauline a haven, Hans an alternative to conversion, Trude an escape from the death camps?

A friend of mine, who has been accused by his family of being a workaholic and not communicating with his four children, recently told me of a strange dream he had. "I was in the back of my house, in the garden," he said. "Four little figures – I did not know who they were – began to approach the garden gate leading to the street. I was terribly frightened and wanted to warn them away from it. But when I tried speaking to them, I couldn't talk. Suddenly, I felt myself turning into a dog and let out a growl. Honestly, a real growl! It even woke my wife, who was so scared by it that she woke me."

"Do you think the four little figures were your children?" I asked.

He thought about that. "I guess they were," he said. "You see, in the dream I so much wanted to protect them. I knew the street was dangerous. I had to stop them from going through that gate. But I had no language to say it to them in. I could only growl like a dog." He had tears in his eyes. "And when they grow up, that's all they'll remember: the non-communicative, growling father they had."

His children will, of course, remember more of him than that. So did Herzl's children; but it was Herzl's personal tragedy that though it was with words that he set the Jews on their path to a state, he had so few for Pauline, Hans and Trude.

Israel Briefs

Greetings from Olmert, Katsav

Israel's prime minister and president both called for Jewish unity in their New Year's greetings to Jews worldwide. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert wrote, "Your participation in strengthening the Jewish homeland is invaluable, and your unwavering encouragement reinforces our determination to live our lives here in Israel and to uphold our Jewish, democratic values." Katsav wrote, "On the eve of the New Year 5767, we are once more facing new and difficult challenges that force us to find effective ways of coping with them." In response to such threats, Katsav wrote, "I call on the Jewish communities to tighten and reinforce the connection between the Jews of the Diaspora and the State of Israel, and I call on Jewish youth all over the world to visit Israel, to act to preserve the Jewish heritage, Jewish values and to strengthen the attachment of the Jewish people to its homeland."

New homes planned

Israel plans to build 164 new homes in three West Bank communities. The Israel Lands Administration issued construction offers for additional housing units in Ariel, Alfei Menashe and Karnei Shomron. The move could upset the United States and European Union given Israel's obligation under the "road map" peace plan to freeze settlement expansion. The three settlements cited are located in blocs that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said would be annexed to Israel under any future peace deal with the Palestinians.

PM's popularity plunges

Ehud Olmert came fifth in an Israeli opinion poll on who should be prime minister. Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu came first in the Yediot Achronot survey with 27 per cent of respondents backing him. He was followed by Avigdor Lieberman, head of Yisrael Beiteinu Party, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres. Olmert's low ranking, with 7 per cent support, reflects dwindling public faith in his government since the Lebanon war.

UN unfair to Israel: Annan

Kofi Annan said Israel is often unfairly judged at the United Nations. The UN secretary general, who steps down after 10 years at the end of 2006, told the opening of the 61st General Assembly last week that the United Nations' reputation for impartiality would suffer as long as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict continued. "On one side, supporters of Israel feel that it is harshly judged by standards that are not applied to its enemies," he said. "And too often this is true, particularly in some UN bodies. On the other side, people are outraged by the disproportionate use of force against Palestinians and by Israel's continued occupation and confiscation of Arab land."

Ahmadinejad backs 'return'

Iran's president called on Israel to admit all Palestinian refugees. "Our position toward the Palestinian question is clear: We say that a nation has been displaced from its own land," Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told Time magazine. "Our suggestion is that the 5 million Palestinian refugees come back to their homes, and then the entire people on those lands hold a referendum and choose their own system of government." Israel has long ruled out a mass influx of Palestinian refugees, saying it would destroy the Jewish state.

Buffett visits Israel

Leading investor Warren Buffett said he is committed to Israel. The Jerusalem Post quoted the U.S. billionaire as saying that "Berkshire Hathaway and Israel will be here forever, as Israel and the U.S. will be here forever." The businessman made the remarks after visiting Iscar, the Israeli company in which Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway recently acquired an 80 per cent stake. The May investment in Iscar, an international metalworks consortium, was valued at $4 billion (US). Buffett said he was also considering buying Israeli utilities companies.

Jewish groups protest Ahmadinejad at UN

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — The 61st convening of the United Nations General Assembly was marked outside the UN building by pro-Israel rallies and inside by a growing ideological rift between the United States and its opponents, with Israel caught in the middle.

U.S. President George W. Bush used his speech to the General Assembly last week to appeal to the people of Iran, telling them that their president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is wasting their resources to build nuclear weapons and support terrorism.

In response, Ahmadinejad sought to paint the United States as an imperialist aggressor that uses Israel as its proxy.

Jewish groups and others came out en masse to protest against Ahmadinejad in a rally organized by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York, the United Jewish Communities and other groups such as Canadian Jewish Congress.

Some 35,000 people rallied across from the United Nations to protest Ahmadinejad's presence at the world body. The crowd also wanted to show solidarity for Israel and implore the United Nations to enforce Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended Israel's war this summer with Hezbollah and calls for the release of three Israeli soldiers taken hostage by Hamas and Hezbollah.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Presidents Conference, referred to Ahmadinejad's night speech to the General Assembly, in which he portrayed the creation of Israel as aggression against the Muslim world.

"He's constantly lied and misrepresented the truth," Hoenlein said, "and he comes and lectures the rest of the world?"

The rally drew dozens of speakers, including Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton, Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, New York Governor George Pataki, Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, and Canadian MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler.

"Shame on you for being the biggest Holocaust denier in the world," Wiesel said of Ahmadinejad. "You bring shame to your culture and your nation."

The United Nations, he added, should also be ashamed for giving Ahmadinejad a forum.

Dershowitz brought to the podium a copy of an indictment he said he was set to file against Ahmadinejad for trying to incite genocide against the Jews.

The rally also featured a healthy number of non-Jewish speakers and protesters. Kimberly Nucco and Sonya Davie, members of Christians United for Israel, came to the rally from Brooklyn. Both had been told in their church that it was imperative to support Israel.

It seemed clear, though, that the Jewish state was at the centre of a power struggle as opponents of the United States paint Israel as an the pawn of U.S. imperialism.

Though he didn't mention Israel by name in a speech laced with improbable appeals for more love and human rights, the Iranian president devoted much of his speech to criticizing the Jewish state.

He also called for the UN Security Council to be reformed so the United States would no longer be a permanent member with veto power. The United States, he said, abuses its veto power to achieve its imperialist goals and stifle the voice of the oppressed, Ahmadinejad argued.

"This is blatantly manifested in the way the elected government of Palestine is treated, as well as in the support extended to the Zionist regime," Ahmadinejad said. "It does not matter if people are murdered in Palestine, turned into refugees, captured, imprisoned or besieged. That must not violate human rights."

Ahmadinejad did not use the UN podium to deny the Holocaust, as he has done publicly in the past, but he made clear that he feels the creation of Israel was an act of aggression.

Palestine "was placed under control of some of the war survivors, bringing even larger population groups from elsewhere in the world, who had not even been affected by the war… driving millions of the rightful inhabitants of the land into a diaspora and homelessness," said Ahmadinejad, who in recent years has called repeatedly for Israel's destruction.

"This is a great tragedy with hardly a precedent in history… Can any member of the United Nations accept such a tragedy occurring in their own homeland?"

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez picked up Ahmadinejad's rhetoric in his speech the next day. Calling Bush the devil, he castigated the Security Council for, in his view, allowing Israel to destroy Lebanon and intentionally kill hundreds of civilians.

"The bombs in Beirut had micro-millimetric accuracy, and they are caught in the crossfire?" Chavez said. "It is genocidal."

'It meant a lot to us to see the project through'

When Jay and Amy Papernick, a recently married young couple from Thornhill, Ont., heard the story of these new immigrants to Israel, they wanted to do something to help the Ethiopian families who returned to the centre after the conflict ended.

"Here they are, totally new to Israel. Most of them speak very little Hebrew, if any. They have come from a very difficult situation to begin with. Then they finally get here, and suddenly they are thrown right into a war," says Jay, a financial advisor with Assante Capital Management in Toronto. "This is no way for them to start their new lives, let alone the New Year, in Israel."

Originally, Jay says, the absorption centre intended to organize a big Rosh Hashanah gathering for the newcomers, all Falash Mora, but because of the war, it had to redirect the celebration budget to fix the damage to the building and feed and care for those who had been relocated during the war.

"After everything they had been through, we thought the least we could do was to give them a great Rosh Hashanah meal for their first Rosh Hashanah in Israel," Jay says.

By the time the couple got the go-ahead from United Israel Appeal (UIA), which agreed to organize the catering of the event from Israel and give them $5,000 (Cdn) of the $15,000 needed for the project, the Papernicks had only three days to raise $10,000. Jay sent out an e-mail to all of their friends and family in Toronto, asking for donations.

"The response was unbelievable," Jay says. "By the time the deadline came around, we had raised $16,000 [from] random friends, family members and co-workers. We told UIA to keep their money for another cause."

A few days later, the Papernicks were on a plane to Israel on a trip they paid for themselves. "It meant a lot to us to see the project through, in person," says Amy, a Grade 2 teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto. "We wanted to be there to connect with the people rather than just give a dinner donated by anonymous people in Canada."

Amy also got the school's Grade 2 and 3 students to make Rosh Hashanah cards in Hebrew and little gifts for the children at the absorption centre. In addition, the Papernicks brought bags of candy, chocolates and New Year's care packages for each family, as well as Canadian flags and pencils.

The personal touch went a long way, Amy says. "The manager of the absorption centre [Yonatan Freedman] kept saying how nice it was that we were actually there to give the gift, because it was much more memorable for them.

"I really enjoyed that part of it," she adds. "We were able to connect with them on a personal level, and I think our presence made their memory of the event that much stronger. I feel that small projects like this make a big difference in people's lives."

In the end, more than 400 people came to the dinner in the ballroom at the Merkaz Hotel in Safed, a lavish dinner that included both Ashkenazi and Sephardi dishes.

"We wanted them to experience a traditional Rosh Hashanah meal," Jay says, adding that the dinner also served as good practice for some of the immigrants who were not used to western skills like using utensils. "The best part of it was the look of enjoyment on their faces. You could tell that they were relieved to not to have to cook and to have something so nice done for them."

To show their appreciation for the event, some of the children performed a short play about Rosh Hashanah. Another child read aloud a poem he wrote about the holiday and the community leader gave a speech to thank the Papernicks.

This was the highlight of the event for Amy. "He got up and did this whole, big speech about how they had never had something so nice, and that it was so great for them to be together for the holiday," she says. "It was beautiful. It felt really good to know that we created [this] experience for them."

The event was also a great learning experience for the Papernicks. "We learned a lot about their culture and how different it is for them to come here," Amy says. "It was really neat to be a part of their culture while they are learning to be a part of ours."

Freedman says that when they first arrive at the centre, most new immigrants from Ethiopia have never seen electric lights, used a toilet or lived in an apartment. When they first come, families of nine or 10 people assume that they are meant to occupy only the living room section of the apartment and other families will occupy the other rooms.

Freedman also says that moving to Israel is especially challenging for the men, who, for the most part, were farmers in Ethiopia and have no skills to bring to their new urban world. The children learn Hebrew quickly and adjust easily to school, the women cook and clean and are able to work in the community, but the men go from being the king of their family to becoming the least useful player in their new life. Depression is common among them.

As for their Judaism, their religious observance has not changed since the destruction of the Second Temple. "When they come to Israel, they have to learn the entire second half of Judaism," Jay says, adding that the most interesting aspect of the cultural exchange was hearing the Ethiopians pray in Hebrew.

"They are so totally different from us in so many ways, but in other ways, their observance is exactly like ours."

By far the biggest thing Canadian Jews and Ethiopian Jews have in common, Jay says, is Zionism. "Having lived through the war [with Hezbollah], all the youth we spoke to said that the only thing that they want to do is join the army. They couldn't be more appreciative of Israel."

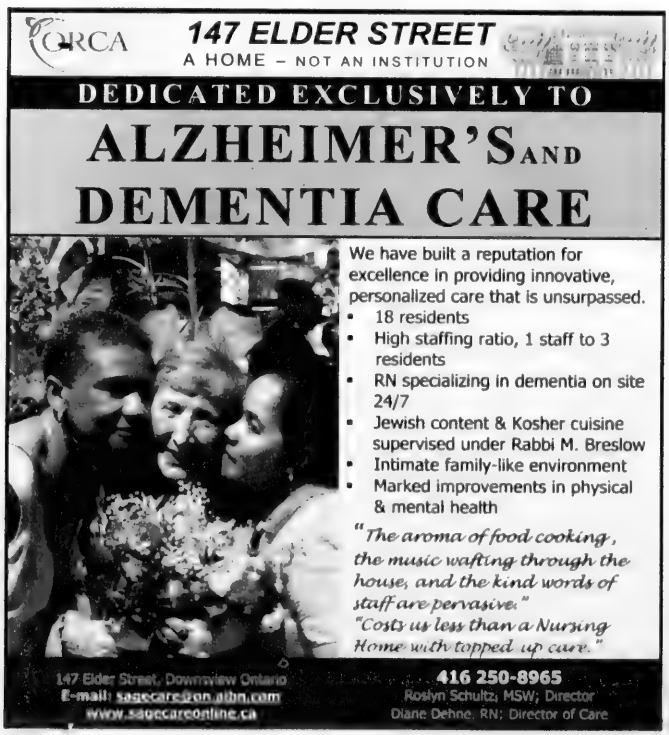
This is one lesson Amy intends to bring back to her students. "I am excited to bring this whole experience back to Bialik and use it as a teaching opportunity for all grades," she says. She has taken lots of photos and video footage of their new friends at the absorption centre.

The Ethiopian children were so touched by the cards the students made them that Amy is going to launch a pen-pal program between them and the Bialik students. "We do so much tikkun olam, but we never see the end result of it," she says. "Now that I can bring back the end result and show the students at Bialik what tikkun olam can do, I think it will do wonders for the program."

Jay says there is still a lot to be done. "It felt a little disheartening that it was just one little thing that we did, and these people are still struggling and could really use more help."

He hopes the initiative marks the beginning of a lasting relationship between the Jews of Toronto and the new immigrants at the Tzahal Absorption Center.

"Until we got there, most of these Ethiopians didn't know where Canada was," he says. "Now they do, and now they know there are Jews in Canada who care about them and who are concerned about their future. Being a part of that felt really good."



Irish academics call for Israel boycott

By HAVIV RETTIG
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israeli academics over the holiday weekend slammed a call for a European Union boycott of Israeli academic institutions delivered by 61 Irish academics in a recent letter to the Irish Times. Signatories to the petition, meanwhile, are defending their actions.

While complaining that the "Israeli government appears impervious to moral appeals from world leaders and to long-standing United Nations resolutions," the Sept. 16 petition called for "a moratorium on any further [cultural and academic] support to Israeli academic institutions, at both national and European levels."

The petition cited Israel's "policy of violent repression against the Palestinians in the occupied territories, and its aggression against the people of Lebanon" and urged that the "moratorium should continue until Israel abides by UN resolutions and ends the occupation of Palestinian territories."

"It is obvious that there is no universal norm [in the call for boycott], only discrimination," Prof. Alexander Yakobson said in response to the petition.

Yakobson, a lecturer in history at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, recently authored a book with former MK and renowned legal scholar Amnon Rubinstein titled Israel and the Family of Nations: The Jewish Nation-State and Human Rights, which confronts anti-Israel activism and discourse.

"The petitioners don't call for a boycott of academic institutions in every country with whose policies they disagree," Yakobson said. "They don't demand a boycott of Sudan, or of China, which has tremendous academic ties to Europe. And they don't want to boycott the United States or Britain over Iraq. There is no universal norm, they're just anti-Israel. So we have to ask what it is about Israel that upsets them."

More importantly, Yakobson said, "they don't demand of any Palestinian academic even to disavow terror." This is particularly strange, he believes, since "even when Europe imposed sanctions on the Hamas government, it did not impose them on Palestinian universities. Nobody has even suggested doing this."

In a letter sent to European Commission members and offices late last week, Yosef Yeshurun of Bar-Ilan University, who chairs the International Advisory Board for Academic Freedom (IAB), and Edward Beck of Walden University, who serves as president of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, blasted the boycott, calling it "antithetical to the universal principle of academic freedom."

"The call for an EU boycott of Israeli academia is a betrayal of [academic] values," Yeshurun and Beck wrote. "Academic life is about building bridges, not destroying them; opening minds, not closing them; hearing both sides of an argument, not one alone," they argued.

Haim Sabato's third novel, The Dawning of the Day: A Jerusalem Tale, has just been released by Toby Press in English translation from the Hebrew. A humble, religious Jerusalemite in Machane Yehuda who works as a presser in a laundry, Ezra Siman Tov is a teller of stories. Ezra also has a source of shame and a secret that overshadows his family, and his pain is particularly acute as Yom Kippur approaches. Only at the bittersweet end of this sensitive psychological mystery do we learn what was the youthful sin that so tormented Ezra. Through him we penetrate the deepest meanings of repentance and atonement. Below is a selection abridged from chapter four.

By HAIM SABATO

A radiant and happy countenance adorned Ezra's face throughout the entire year, except for the days between the Straits and the Days of Penitence. During the Days of Penitence the tension and heaviness were apparent in his demeanour. From the day they announced the coming of the month of Elul in the Zoharei Hamah Synagogue up until the moment he emerged from the ritual bath on the eve of the Day of Atonement, a period of almost six weeks, a cloud hovered about him, as if he were a man anxious and concerned.

In these weeks he increased his service of heaven and spent less time on idle matters, rising early to recite the penitential prayers and remaining silent for long stretches of time, augmenting his almsgiving and beneficence to acquire advocates in the heavenly court.

During this period, Haham Menashe would rid his homilies of humorous and entertaining tales and deliver words of chastisement and ethical rebuke, filling his sermons with discussions of Sha'arei Teshuvah by Rabbeinu Jonah the Pietist or The Duties of the Heart by Rabbeinu Bahya. Ezra Siman Tov would listen to the penitential prayers and hymns and shake with anticipation. Their words would take hold of his heart.

My youthful vigour cares but for itself.
When will I my haughty spirit save?
And how may I my maker truly serve, when I am but my carnal passion's slave?
What can I utter? Implacable desires pursue me from childhood to the grave.

His heart shuddered at the gravity of judgment. The verses repeated themselves in his mind throughout the day and would not relent for even the slightest moment.

Haim Sabato

'For several years he wept and pleaded for his sin to be pardoned'

My youthful vigour cares but for itself.
When will I my haughty spirit save?
My youthful vigour cares but for itself.
When will I my haughty spirit save?

He was filled with terror of Day of Judgment. Each time he arrived at the appeal for repentance in the prayer of the 18 blessings, his eyes filled with tears, and the memory of the folly committed in his youth loomed before him and did not leave him. Hard and painful the deed had been, and still more painful was its memory. At those moments the sigh of the poet would appear before him.

Whither may I turn for succour, for support on judgment day?
Constantly my sins surround me; I flush with shame, in disarray;
If my friends could scent my errors, they would flee without delay.

For several years he wept and pleaded for his sin to be pardoned, and he scrubbed and scoured the stain with all his might. But every year during the penitential days, it seemed to him as though his sin returned and stood mockingly before him: "You think that you have erased the stain. You err." And he could tell that his sin spoke truthfully. Ezra well knew what the Torah promised about repentance, that the sages had said, "Great is repentance for it reaches unto the Throne of Glory," but "the heart recognizes its own bitterness." But he felt the impure thoughts about that sin accompany him, for they had not been entirely uprooted and filled him with shame.

Thus he walked, meditating upon repentance and filled with shame, throughout the time between the first days of the month of Elul and the eve of the Day of Atonement.

On the eve of the Day of Atonement, after having been flogged on his back with a calfskin strap by the beadle of the synagogue, Benjamin Assoulin, in commemoration of the 40 lashes; after his lips had uttered the verse three times, "But He, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time He turned his anger away, and did not stir up all His wrath"; after he had descended and immersed himself in the pure waters of the ritual bath in order to fulfil what is said, that "we have come through fire and water," and had emerged and dried off; only then, at that moment, was it apparent that his sin had been reconciled.

A certain spirit of purity and appeasement spread throughout the world. At that instant, even the slightest memory of the sin seemed fleeting, and he was filled with love toward the entire world. When he sat in the Zoharei Hamah synagogue before the opening prayer, Kol Nidrei, with the entire congregation wrapped in white prayer shawls, and listened to Haham Eliyahu Raful begin the hymn To Thee my God, my yearning. "In Thee, my soul and my mind, my breath and my spirit," he felt his heart fill with great longing and tenderness. When Haham Raful reached the closing lines of the hymn:

With my whole heart, Thee have I sought;
May my request not be for naught.
Wash out my errors in thy grace,
With tears I shed before thy face;
Truly my soul has said its piece
Through Thee my God I seek my peace
Gather in with love my sin
On the day that I am gathered in,
The day when I to meet Thee go
Accept my Lord my conduct so
And grant to me my just reward
For those that follow Thee, O Lord…

His entire being shook and stirred as if a spirit of purity from the recesses of the synagogue had settled upon him. Once, in those very moments, a thought had occurred to him: Would that when the time comes for me to depart from the world I might depart with that very hymn and melody.

Every Thursday night… Ezra would walk through Nahlaot, down a small alleyway off Betzalel Street next to the Synagogue of the Jarmulkim, and then descend 10 steps before arriving at the house of the celebrated musician Rahamim Kalifa.

Rahamim was a great artist. He was also blind. A lonely, childless man. An extraordinary player of the oud, the qanun and the violin… The cantors had learned many melodies from Rahamim, each one different from the others. What they all had in common was the pain that pulsed through them and melted the hardness every heart. Yet they were not entirely forlorn – a thin thread of light always sprang forth full of hope, and even the pain itself was gentle…

Ezra Siman Tov would come to Rahamim's house every Thursday evening armed with two overflowing baskets. Tiptoeing silently, he opened the door quietly. As soon as Ezra put his hand on the doorknob, Rahamim would recognize him and call out "Ezra, welcome"…

As soon as he arrived, he picked up a broom and swept the house free of dust, filled a bucket with water and washed the floor. Afterwards, he would take a rag and wipe the dust off the few pieces of furniture in the room. In the kitchen, he would wash the dishes that lay in the sink, then put a pot of water on to boil, put away the food he had brought with him for the Sabbath. He would prepare a mug of hot tea, bring it to Rahamim and sit down at his side.

Every Thursday, Rahamim asked Ezra to tell him a story. And Ezra would do so. When Ezra finished telling his tale, Rahamim would pick up his violin, tuck it under his chin, pick up his bow, focus his thoughts as if he were standing at prayer, and fill the room with sweet and pleasing sounds. Throughout the entire week he played the qanun; this was the only time that he touched his aged fiddle.

The violin sighed, wept softly, cried; then it moaned, wavered, and prayed; then it opened a window onto a new world and seemed to laugh as if it were floating and dancing lightly. Ezra closed his eyes in those moments as if his spirit had left his body and floated through other worlds. At last Rahamim would put down his bow, raise his chin from the violin.

Once Rahamim asked him, "Ezra, what would you call the story told by my violin?"

Ezra was silent.

Rahamim turned to him. "If I were to take a title from Scripture, I would call it 'My soul, wait thou only upon God'; for my expectation is from Him; from the writings of the sages, I would call it 'The Lord desires Thy Heart.'"

Ezra remained silent. When he got up to leave, a phrase from one of the dawn hymns occurred to him and stood in front of him, pleading. He said to him, "I would call it, 'The Dawning of the Day.'"

Throughout his entire life, Ezra had never heard such a melody, or anything like it; and Rahamim had never performed such a melody, not on any other day, or for anyone else. Neither Rahamim nor Ezra ever told anyone about this melody. It was a secret between the two of them. Who knew its meaning?

Watch the caloric content of alcoholic beverages

Q. I have an alcoholic drink on occasion, and I am wondering about the difference in calories between wine, hard liquor and beer. Could you please tell me which has the fewest calories?

A. There is certainly a difference in the calories in various alcoholic beverages, but, of course, the amount is important too. Many people, when pouring a drink, tend to be a little generous and actually drink more than they think they are. So if you're concerned about the calories, start by having a good sense of the real size of your drink.

Regular beer has about 150 calories in 12 ounces, about the same as a can of pop. Light beer has about 100 calories in the same size serving, so there are 33 per cent fewer calories, an amount that is substantial if you drink beer often. With hard liquor, including scotch, vodka, rum and whiskey, 1.5 ounces contain between 100 and 125 calories, while 3.5 ounces of wine (red, white or blush) contain about 75 calories.

By comparing these amounts, you can see that wine is lowest in calories, but again, the most significant issue to consider is the amount that you drink. Two drinks every night really add up, not only in terms of calories, but also in the effect that alcohol has on your metabolism.

While alcohol is fat free, you should look at it as if it was a little dessert in a glass. Alcohol is metabolized as a sugar in the body, and those added calories do count. Ideally if you are drinking with a meal, you should eat less to compensate accordingly for these calories; however, we tend to do the opposite. We typically drink alcohol at our largest meal of the day or week. We drink when we are out on a Saturday night and eating a large, rich meal. Or at the Shabbat table, which again is often a heavy meal. So be aware of how much you're drinking as well as how often.

When you drink, you notice that you feel relaxed. Alcohol has an almost sedative-like effect. This slows your body down, including your metabolism. The alcohol does not necessarily do permanent damage to your metabolism – it returns to normal after the alcohol wears off – but in the interim, you are burning off the food less efficiently than if you had not consumed alcohol with the meal. Therefore, if you drink most nights, or many nights, then you create this effect often. This will not be a problem if you are careful about the quantity of both food and alcohol. Otherwise, it may contribute to added weight.

One way to indulge in alcoholic beverages and still limit calories is to have drinks like wine spritzers (wine mixed with soda water). Or try a bloody mary or bloody caesar. While fruit juice is high in calories, tomato juice is low and very filling, and you'll eat less, making one of these a great cocktail party choice.

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, bubbie's birthday or a business banquet, the Toronto Hard Rock is where they'll always treat you like a rock star.

After all, points out the Cafe's event manager Marcelo DeOliveira, it was a Hard Rock crew that provided backstage catering for last year's Live8 concert, as well as its illustrious predecessor, Live Aid, two decades prior.

With 14,000 square feet over two levels, including a separate nightclub and streetside patio, the Hard Rock in Toronto offers a wide variety of configurations for a wide variety of events, from family celebrations to Fortune 500 conferences, breakfast through late-night.

Says DeOliveira: "We've hosted countless bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate receptions, product launches, press conferences and weddings. We've put on events for 50 guests and for 500, hosting everyone from Deloitte & Touche to the big music company BMG. And people love the place. It's a very special environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on the wall. There's Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. There's a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince, and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen—better known as Paul Stanley of Kiss. That's not to mention the beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

DeOliveira explains that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "You can do a sit-down dinner or a buffet—for instance, our bar and bat mitzvah buffet includes, among other things, lox canapes, spanikopita, caesar salad, roasted chicken and lasagna. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the Cafe. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us—whether you're a certified public accountant or a certified 13-year-old—you're a rock star."

Jazz singer Sophie Milman surprised by her success

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Sophie Milman

When she moved to Toronto in 1999, the Russian-born teenager would never have believed seven years later she'd be performing to a thousand people to promote her top-selling jazz album.

But Sophie Milman, now 23, a commerce student at the University of Toronto, is taking it all in stride. Since her self-titled album was released over a year and a half ago, she's been busy touring and keeping up with her studies. She'll be playing at the Winter Garden Theatre in Toronto on Oct. 28.

"I am surprised by my success for sure," Milman says. "As the record started doing better, my expectations have changed. At first I didn't allow myself to hope for too much."

Milman, who moved from east Russia to Israel when she was seven and then to Toronto at 16, has sold more than 50,000 copies of her debut CD and was up for a Juno Award this year, losing to Diana Krall. "I was in pretty good company with Paul Anka," she says of her nomination. "It was all fun. I didn't go to the Junos expecting to win and didn't have a speech prepared."

At her boyfriend's urging, she did scribble something down on a napkin just in case. "For the most part, I've been really lucky. It doesn't always happen as quickly as it happened to me. Fifty thousand copies is not Diana Krall, but it's good for an indie release. When this all started, I wasn't expecting to sell that much."

It was Canadian jazz producer Bill King who spotted her performing at a jazz singer series he hosted. After seeing her perform a few times, he realized she was no fluke, and she was offered a recording contract with the independent label Linus, which has a major distribution deal with Warner Music. Since then, her album has been solidly in the top five jazz recordings in Canada and was a No. 1 download on iTunes in France and the United States.

After spending the summer touring all over the United States, Milman is now back at school, but her hectic schedule means she can only attend part time. "I no longer think I'm Superwoman, studying full time in the week and performing in Mexico City on the weekend," she says.

"Things are happening at an insane speed, my life is definitely a lot more hectic," she says, and people are telling her to quit school altogether. "I'm not that kind of person. I really want to finish my education."

It hasn't always been easy for Milman. She was born near the Ural Mountains in eastern Russia, but moved to Israel as a young child with her family when the opportunity presented itself after the fall of communism. "It was very difficult," she says of the transition. "I stopped being a kid and became a tiny little adult. I went from being a Jew in Russia to a Russian in Israel. In 1989-90, over a million Russian Jews went to Israel. In the beginning, there was lots of animosity and we suffered a lot."

No sooner was she getting settled, then she was on the move again. In 1999, her family immigrated to Canada, settling in Toronto, mostly because of the security situation in Israel.

When she moved to Toronto, she never anticipated singing was what she'd be doing now. "I was an angry teenager. I was a loner, totally alienated from the high school community [Forest Hill Collegiate]. Nobody could have told me I'd be playing in front of 1,000 people. It's insane."

It was in Israel that Milman discovered jazz. Unable to afford a CD player and new CDs, she fell under the spell of her father's records, listening to artists such as Ella Fitzgerald, Louis Armstrong, George Gershwin and Oscar Peterson. "He's a huge jazz fan and he started to throw all these jazz records at me. I was not really exposed to other stuff growing up," Milman says, showing no trace of either a Russian or Hebrew accent.

After performing in so many places over the past year, Milman is looking forward to playing in her hometown on Oct. 28. "It will be fun. We have lots of new material to play. But it will also be nerve-racking. My parents and friends who haven't seen me play in a long time will be there."

Next year, in addition to studying and performing on weekends, Milman will be spending at least a week in Japan, where her album has just been released. "We'll be touring all the biggest jazz clubs there. The record has become a bit of a hit there," she says. She's also working on new material and is hoping to find some time to go to the studio to record a new album next year.

Her current album, a mixture of popular jazz standards, undiscovered gems and contemporary songs includes Edith Piaf's La Vie en Rose; the Sondheim/Bernstein hit I Feel Pretty, Ochi Cherenye, an old Russian song, and Matchmaker Matchmaker from Fiddler on the Roof. It has recently been released in Europe and is doing well there as well.

"It's a hit in Poland," she says. "That's a little weird. I'm a hit in Poland – how weird does that sound?"

Israeli film portrays a doomed gay relationship

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

What do you do for an encore?

Tel Aviv-based filmmakers Eytan Fox and Gal Uchovsky must have asked themselves this question after the commercial success of their last film, Walk on Water, the highest-grossing movie in Israeli history.

The story of a Mossad secret-service agent assigned to track down a Nazi war criminal, Walk on Water was screened in 25 countries and was a box-office hit, earning a grand total of $7 million (US).

Mainly set on Sheinkin Street, in their hip neighbourhood in central Tel Aviv, The Bubble is unique in terms of subject matter – the first Israeli feature-length film about a gay relationship between an Israeli Jew and a Palestinian Arab.

Eytan Fox, who made The Bubble, with Gal Uchovsky, said Tel Aviv, where the film is set, "is the only truly liberal and progressive place to live in Israel."

"Our timing was terrible," said Fox, noting that movie theatres all over northern Israel closed in response to Hezbollah Katyusha rocket fire.

But once the war ended in mid-August, The Bubble bounced back and the buzz about it resumed.

"It has created a lot of commotion in Israel," said Fox, the director and co-screenwriter. "Not left-wing enough, too left-wing. Too gay, not gay enough. It got people talking. Numerous articles have been published about it."

In The Bubble, which is due to be released in Canada next year, Noam (Ohad Knoller), an Israeli reservist soldier, strikes up a red-hot romance with Ashraf (Yousef "Joe" Sweid), a Palestinian from Nablus, after a chance meeting at a checkpoint in the West Bank.

Fox and Uchovsky, who are both gay and live as a couple in the cosmopolitan neighbourhood where the film mostly unfolds, are partial toward gay characters and situations.

In Walk on Water (2004), the grandson of the hunted Nazi criminal is gay, while in Yossi & Jagger (2002), two male soldiers stationed in southern Lebanon gravitate to each other.

Fox, who was born in New York City and raised in Jerusalem, regards The Bubble as something of a paean to Tel Aviv, whose openness and cosmopolitanism he highly appreciates.

"Tel Aviv is a socially and culturally vibrant city, and is the only truly liberal and progressive place to live in Israel. But Tel Aviv is a bubble, cut off from the harsh reality of the Middle East."

Not surprisingly, gays feel comfortable in Tel Aviv.

"It has amazingly become one of the world's most hospitable havens for homosexuals," observed Fox, who is 42. "But this was not always the case, and is a reaction to previous years of oppression," he added. "Lots of Israelis would leave Israel if not for Tel Aviv, which is an alternative to the religious right."

Uchovsky, the 48-year-old producer and co-scriptwriter whose artistic collaboration with Fox began in 1997 with the musical short Gotta Have Heart, agrees with his partner's assessment.

"Israel is very tolerant toward gays and lesbians, which marks a shift in attitude. Israel is one of the best countries in the Middle East for gays and lesbians."

This emerges in The Bubble loud and clear.

Ashraf, the scion of a socially conservative clan, has no choice but to conceal his homosexuality from family and friends. Only in Israel, and in the arms of Noam, can he truly be himself and find happiness and bliss.

"Palestinian society is not really open to gays," said Uchovsky, who has been a vocal advocate of gays rights for the past two decades. "It's complicated to be a gay there, and even more so to sleep with the enemy."

Fox believes that Israeli and Palestinian gays may one day be lovers, friends and partners. But in The Bubble, friendships of this kind are definitely doomed.

Expressing pessimism over the state of Israel's current relations with the Palestinians, Fox commented, "We're in one of the worst times as far as hope goes. Israelis have become cynical, but I think people want to live in peace."

Fox, who opposed the recent war in Lebanon from the outset, said that Israel must be flexible in its approach toward the Palestinians.

"They will be our neighbours forever, and we have to find a way of talking to them."

For real peace, he said, Israel should be prepared to withdraw to the pre-1967 lines and resolve the gnawing Palestinian refugee problem.

"We've conducted ourselves wrongly and we've gone astray," said Fox in a reference to Israel's policies toward the Palestinians. "But I love Israel and care about it."

ROYAL ALEXANDRA THEATRE TURNING 100 YEARS YOUNG

The Royal Alexandra Theatre, the Edwardian-era theatre that Honest Ed Mirvish rescued from possible demolition in the '60s, is turning 100 years old next year. The Alex opened on August 26, 1907, and has been in almost continuous operation as a legitimate theatre ever since.

The "Grande Dame of King Street" was recently renovated in preparation for its centenary and the Toronto publishing house McArthur & Company has begun preparing a commemorative book. Members of the public are being asked to contribute stories, photos and other memorabilia.

The Royal Alex's rich history happens to overlap with that of Toronto's Jewish community, since numerous Yiddish productions were performed there in the early days and its first longtime manager was Lawrence (Lol) Solmon, a prominent businessman and member of the Jewish community.

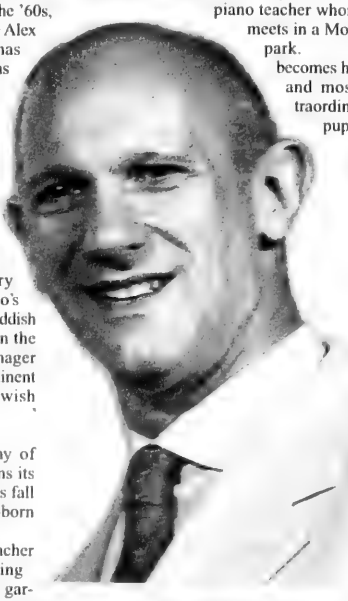
Names in the News: The Academy of Motion Pictures in Los Angeles opens its Outstanding Documentaries series this fall with Mr. Mergler's Gift by Montreal-born filmmaker Beverly Shaffer.

Shaffer is a former high school teacher who took up film as a more interesting way to earn a living. Her works have garnered more than 40 awards during her career at the National Film Board. She won an Oscar for her sensitive portrayal of a disabled girl in I'll Find A Way (1978), one in a series about children from diverse backgrounds across Canada.

Mr. Mergler's Gift explores the relationship between a nine-year-old pianist, the daughter of Chinese immigrants, and her piano teacher whom she meets in a Montreal park. She becomes his last and most extraordinary pupil.



David Mirvish

Shaffer's filmography includes To My Birthmother (2002), about a woman's search for her biological mother, and the Children of Jerusalem series produced between 1991 and '96, focusing on the lives of seven Palestinian and Israeli children. Before joining the National Film Board, she worked for the American PBS network in Boston on the acclaimed series Nova and Zoom.

Names in the News II: Joe Rosenblatt, one-time Governor General's Award winner (1976) is the subject of Joe Rosenblatt: Essays on His Works, a recent addition to a notable literary series from Guernica Editions. Edited by Linda Rogers, the book offers a biographical peek at a Canadian original who deftly combines words and images in both his poetry and art. Its 18 essays include pieces by Barry Callaghan, Susan Musgrave, Ada Donati and Sharon Abron Drache.

While we're on the subject, we've been informed that a photo that ran in this space recently was misidentified as Michael Redhill but was actually Joe Rosenblatt. The CJN regrets the error.

Musical and Drama

• Diane Flacks performs her one-woman show, Bear with Me, a comic flight into the secret and insane world of motherhood, as part of the Between Stages playwrights reading series. Pay what you can. Suggested donation $8. Thursday, Sept. 28, 7 p.m. esthera@mnjcc.org, 416-924-6211, ext. 606

• The acclaimed play Hana's Suitcase, written by Emil Sher and based on the bestselling book by Karen Levine, returns to the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People from Sept. 30 to Oct. 19 before embarking on a Canadian tour. Dates have been confirmed for the Citadel Theatre in Edmonton (Oct. 28 to Nov. 12) and the Manitoba Theatre for Young People in Winnipeg (Nov. 16 to 26).

• Balagan, a huge band featuring Mickey Lewin, Jordan Klapman and others, plays everything from traditional Jewish tunes to modern Israeli pop, including Hebrew bossa novas, French cabaret, and Mediterranean and Afro-Cuban rhythms. Nadal JCC, Al Green Theatre. $12-$10. Oct. 5, 8 p.m.

Television & Film

• TV Ontario launches a new flagship current affairs program this week. The Agenda with Steve Paikin airs nightly at 8 p.m. and is repeated at 11. The show practises what Paikin calls "long-form" journalism, each program tackling only one or two topics. The show also marks TVO's entry into the emerging sphere of "citizen journalism," and utilizes video, audio and written content sent in by viewers.

• Garry Beitel's documentary Chez Schwartz premières at the Calgary International Film Festival on Sept. 30. The Montreal filmmaker is slated to attend the opening, where 100 pounds of Schwartz's famous Montreal smoked meat will be served. "The film is about how a place that is a legend has an effect on the people who work and eat there," said Beitel, who spent nearly a year at the famous deli and shot more than 70 hours of footage.

•A repeat broadcast of Fatherland, a film by Manfred Becker about how three generations of Germans are dealing with Germany's responsibility for the Holocaust, airs on History Television, Thursday, Sept. 28, 9:30 p.m. Becker's documentary, Hitler's Children: Germany in Autumn 1977, about the Baader-Meinhof gang, premières on the same channel on Oct. 4, 10 p.m.

Literary Notes

• The grand opening of George Faludy Place, a city parkette dedicated to the recently deceased Hungarian-Jewish poet, takes place Tuesday, Oct. 3, 12:30 p.m. The parkette, a co-operative effort of the City of Toronto, Toronto Legacy Project, Heritage Toronto and University of Toronto, is located opposite 25 St. Mary St. (south of Charles Street, east of Bay Street).

• Ottawa professor-poet Seymour Mayne is slated to read his word sonnet sequence Hail as a prelude to a performance by soprano Doreen Taylor Claxton at the launch of a CD featuring musical and vocal renditions of Mayne's word sonnets. The event, part of this year's Ottawa International Writers Festival, is free and open to the public. Foyer, Library and Archives Canada, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa. Thursday, Oct. 5, 8:30 p.m.

• Anne Dublin, Leora A. Freedman, Larry Frolick, Jonathan Garfinkel, Yaacov Glickman, Lynne Kositsky, David Levine and Hannah Moscovitch are among the 79 writers named as grant recipients last week by the Toronto Arts Council. A total of $345,000 was handed out through the Grants to Writers program for 2006.

Jazz singer, 12, makes homework her priority

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

Jazz singer Nikki Yanofsky adores the vocals of Ella Fitzgerald and Aretha Franklin. She admires the young singers Joss Stone and Christina Aguilera. She counts The Wizard of Oz and Rent among her favourite musicals. She enthuses about Mitch Albom's bestseller, The Five People You Meet in Heaven.

However, the big news is that this 12-year-old Montrealer currently tops the charts of local music critics and is on their "must see and hear" lists. And Nikki's recent concerts have benefited the Maimonides, the Montreal Children's Hospital, the Jewish General Hospital's cancer research and other worthy causes.

"Nikki took pride in sharing the first cheque she earned with the Montreal Children's Hospital, and there is still a fund [at the hospital] in her name," says her mother, Elyssa.

"I like singing at concerts, but the best part is when everybody likes what I sing," Nikki says. "Besides, if people need money more than I do, they should have it."

Blessed with a powerful voice and bright brown eyes and possessing a ready smile and a friendly demeanour, Nikki is confident yet unassuming. She also realizes the value of a good education.

"I take more time on my homework than on singing. Even though I may want to watch TV after school, I make sure to do my assignments first."

As for other pastimes, Nikki enjoys playing basketball with her older brothers, Michael and Andrew. She is also fond of her baby cousin. "Her name is Ella, just like my favourite singer."

Nikki says she doesn't get nervous about performing and she finds it easy to memorize songs. She also does some scatting, adding that scatting is more difficult than people realize.

Nikki sings Airmail Special, a song that involves concentrated scatting. The technique is defined as a vocal imitation of instrumental phrases. Scat singers improvise singing of syllables without specific words. "She spent a good 48 hours of concentrated study to perfect it," her mother said, noting some singers focus on scatting for their doctorates.

Nikki must attend group rehearsals plus practise on her own before each concert. She has learned to play the piano and the drums by ear and plans to study the saxophone at school.

"Nikki doesn't take singing lessons but she has a voice coach," her mother says. "My husband helps me field a lot of calls and we have a musical director."

Nikki is planning to record a track on a CD, sponsored by the Bank Nationale and Jean Coutu Pharmacy, which will benefit underprivileged children.

Nikki credits her family for exposing her to music at an early age. "I was born in 1994, and by 1996, I was already listening to Broadway music, which, incidentally, I like acting out in my kitchen using the big mirror." At a later stage, she discovered jazz, while searching songs on iTunes. She was immediately captivated by the genre.

Last summer, Nikki made headlines for her stellar performances at the Montreal International Jazz Festival, where she sang before thousands of people. She stole the show, performing with well-known instrumentalists and vocalists.

Performing and preparing for upcoming shows and recordings keep her busy. At the ORT Gala, at Place des Arts, she will be accompanied by a full orchestra and other singers . She is also booked to do a fundraiser in Toronto with a trio.

Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir performs in Toronto

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir will stop in Toronto on its current North American tour.

The choir, under the direction of Michael Turetsky, will sing liturgies, opera classics and Broadway hits in 10 languages, including Hebrew, English, Spanish, French and Russian, at an Oct. 6 concert at 8 p.m at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

The choir has performed at Carnegie Hall, at the United Nations, in Washington, D.C., for the U.S. Congress, and in Spain during the commemoration of the 500th year of the Spanish expulsion of the Jews. The choir has accompanied Placido Domingo, Isaac Stern and Zubin Mehta.

The Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir was created in 1989 as part of a program to revive cantorial and synagogue choir music in Russia. Choir members, many of whom also play instruments, were trained in conservatories in the former Soviet Union.

"I am proud to bring to Toronto Russia's most famous choir," says concert producer Ella Tcheloznova.

"Although many Russians attend their performances, there is a growing audience of people who do not speak Russian but enjoy this international choir, which delights everybody."

Search begins for Canada's best Jewish basketball players

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ted Badner is looking for the best male basketball players that the Jewish community has to offer to represent Canada next year at the 11th Pam-Am Maccabi Games.

Badner, the head coach of the Canadian Maccabi men's open basketball team, who has been involved with Maccabi Canada since he coached the under-16 basketball team at the 1999 Pan-Am games in Mexico City, said he has a list of the top Canadian Jewish basketball players, 28 of whom have played university or college basketball.

"This team will be made up of players who have played at an elite level of basketball," said Badner, adding that only 12 men will make the team that will compete in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in December 2007.

"There is a chance that some younger players could come, but it would be pretty stiff competition. Guys that are still in high school might have a difficult time making the team," said Irvin Mintz, a former assistant head coach at the Pan-Am games who is helping Badner spread the word.

Badner said that having also been involved in the Pan-Am games in 2003 – when his under-19 team won silver – and the Maccabiah Games in Israel in 2001 and 2005, he has a general understanding of the Canadian Jewish basketball community.

"I've built up a database of Jewish basketball players, but there may be 10 or 15 guys out there that I don't even know are Jewish," said Badner, a basketball coach at Newtonbrook Secondary School in Toronto.

Children of intermarried parents may have last names that don't sound Jewish, but a player only needs one Jewish parent to qualify to play at the Maccabi games, he said.

"With a name like Cohen or Schwartz, you're going to assume that the kid is Jewish. But if you see a guy with the last name McDonald, you think, OK, the father is probably not Jewish. But that doesn't mean the mother wasn't a Jew and the father converted," Badner said.

"There is a chance that some players, young Jewish men, have never experienced Maccabiah or don't know about it… We're looking for players all the time," Mintz said.

"I want to be able to reach out to all communities… to a guy who is from Moose Jaw, Sask., who is playing varsity basketball at the University of Regina… who has no idea that these games exist," Badner said.

While Badner and Mintz are searching for the country's best Jewish basketball players, the Pan-Am Maccabi games, like the Maccabiah games that take place in Israel every four years, also hold competitions in many sports, including baseball, volleyball, soccer, softball, swimming and tennis.

While most of the teams that compete in the Pan-Am games come from countries in North, Central and South American, Australia and Israel also usually send teams to the games.

In 2003 in Santiago, Chile, more than 2,000 athletes competed and about 20 countries took part.

Although the 2003 Canadian men's open basketball team failed to medal, Badner said that winning gold next year is a realistic expectation.

"Our goal is to win the gold medal. If you talk to anyone in the United States, they'll laugh at us, but my team, back in 2003, beat the U.S. in the round robin. The U.S. beat us to win the gold medal, but the U.S. is 10 times the size of us in both Jewish population and national population. It is a pretty lofty goal, but that is our goal," he said.

"This is a very high-level competition and we expect to go there with a very competitive team and our goal is to win a gold medal."

Badner expects to select a team by December, at which point, Maccabi Canada will begin to raise funds in an attempt to cover the costs of sending a team to Argentina.

"What we've done in the past is some serious fundraising and we hope to cover the cost of all our players, but if we can't come up with all the money, the players would be responsible for covering the shortfall," Mintz said.

"The misconception is that every Jew has money, but there may be some top-quality university players who won't be able to go unless we are able to fundraise," Badner said.

Open tryouts will be held in Toronto at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Saturday, Nov. 11, from 8 to 10 p.m. and on Sunday, Nov. 12, at Newtonbrook Secondary School from 9 to 11 a.m. and 1 to 3 p.m.

In Montreal, tryouts will be held the following weekend at the Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre on Saturday, Nov. 18, and Sunday, Nov. 19, at the same times.

The top players will be asked to attend national tryouts at the end of December in Toronto.

Players who live outside Toronto and Montreal aren't expected to show up for the November tryouts. They can contact Badner to make arrangements to come to the national tryouts in Toronto.

Inside Back

Fear in Europe, fear in Montreal

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

It's a frightening world out there for Diaspora Jews. Around the globe, anti-Semitism is once again on the rise, leaving Jews feeling vulnerable and Jewish institutions exposed to attack. Over the past few years, those who hate us – and, increasingly, that despicable demographic is being populated by radical Islamists and not simply run-of-the-mill racists – have shown a desire to destroy our institutions and their constituents, resorting to arson, violence and even murder. For Diaspora Jews, it's getting more and more difficult to find a peaceful place to live.

New Views

In Europe, the rise in hatred toward Jews has received much publicity. Across the United Kingdom, anti-Semitic attacks have ranged from the bigoted rantings of London Mayor Ken Livingstone to a handful of attempted (though unsuccessful) boycotts of Israeli institutions by academics. Thus far, anti-Semitic attacks in England have been rather tame, but with a rise in attacks by Islamic terrorists – including the July 2005 London transit bombings – and the revelation only a few weeks ago of a foiled airline plot that might have killed hundreds, English Jews should be feeling nervous.

French anti-Semitism has taken a far more sinister tone over the past five years. Synagogues and cemeteries have been torched and vandalized, students have been assaulted and two French Jews have been murdered (both, apparently, at the hands of radical Muslims). In 2004, the anti-Semitic explosion in France even prompted then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon to urge all French Jews to move to Israel – and many French Jews are doing just that.

Europe is certainly in bad shape, but are Jews that much safer in Canada?

For the Jewish community in Montreal, the answer is a definite no. Over the last few weeks, Canadian Jews have been shocked by two stories that emphasize the threat – both existential and practical – faced by Montreal's Jewish community.

On Sept. 2, a masked male caused more than $150,000 in damage when he lobbed a Molotov cocktail into a chassidic school operated by Montreal's Skver community. This most recent act of arson adds to an ever-growing tradition of vandalism and violence against Jewish institutions in Montreal (including the April 2005 firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs school by Hamas sympathizers).

Perhaps more frightening, a recent survey found that nearly 40 per cent of Quebecers believe the Sept. 11 attacks were at least partially a result of Israel's actions in the Middle East. As reported in the The CJN (Sept. 14), that's more than 10 per cent higher than in the rest of our country. And while the statistics don't particularly bode well for Jews across Canada, the higher number in Quebec means that a significantly larger percentage of people there have bought into the precise reasoning about 9/11 that's being espoused by those who perpetrated the attacks and the Islamic groups that continue to support terrorism.

Of course, there are still safe Jewish communities in North America. Most notably, in Toronto, Canada's largest Jewish community continues to experience little anti-Semitism, and virtually none of the kind that threatens to harm its members or destroy institutions. For the most part, the combined efforts of community leaders, law enforcement officials and local government have prevented anti-Jewish hatred from getting out of hand. Protests at the city's universities and rallies at the Israeli consulate are mere annoyances when compared to the brand of anti-Semitism practised outside Toronto.

But in Montreal, the situation continues to worsen. For a long time, French-Canadian anti-Semitism was cloaked in Quebec's traditional politically left leanings – world events provided a convenient context for hating Jews. But that disguise has been discarded over the past few years. In Quebec, apparently, anti-Semitism is no longer a faux pas.

It might be time for Jewish leaders to start thinking about voicing Sharon-style encouragements to the Jews of Montreal.

Succoth Ruby Caribbean Grapefruit Chicken

2 lg red grapefruits
6 boneless, skinless chicken breasts
1/2 c flour
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
6 tblsp unsalted pareve margarine
2/3 c chopped shallots, about 4
1/2 c each: light & dark rum
1/2 c honey
1/4 c fresh lime juice
3 tblsp chopped cilantro
1 c chopped green onions, white and 2" of green

Peel grapefruits, divide into segments; remove seeds. Set aside. Cut breasts into 1" strips. Place the flour in shallow plate and season liberally with salt and pepper. Toss chicken in flour. Heat margarine in large nonstick skillet. Add strips; sauté over medium heat; about 5 minutes. Remove from the pan; drain on paper towels. Add chopped shallots to skillet; saute about 4 minutes. Off the heat, add the rums. Bring rums to a boil; reduce for 3 min. Stir in honey and lime juice; simmer 3 minutes. Remove skillet from heat; stir in cilantro, green onions, grapefruit segments. Arrange chicken strips on a platter; pour sauce over.

This morning's guest: God

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Good morning and welcome to YK5767 Talk Radio. We have a special guest this morning. God is here with us, and we're going to take calls addressing the question: Are we, human beings and God, good partners in taking care of our world?

URBAN WRITER

Host: Shlomo from Thornhill, thanks for calling. What would you like to ask God?

Shlomo: Well, God, probably a good question to ask at Yom Kippur time is, do you have any thoughts on how it is that people have been eyewitnesses to so many wars, yet we allow them to continue unabated?

God: Thanks for calling, Shlomo. You know there is much evil in the world, and always has been. However, goodness outweighs it and is stronger than evil and therefore must stand up strongly and loudly to overshadow it. People could stop wars if they committed themselves to doing so, but so far my idea of acting as "my brother's keeper" has never really kicked in. I was hoping that Rwanda would have been a paragon of virtue, but instead it turned into a very ugly sore. I was hoping the Vietnamese, Cambodians and those from the Congo would have shown the world how to do good deeds – but instead they trained us in the use of a machete. Change it, Shlomo. Encourage the world to do so as well.

Host: Thanks, Shlomo. Let's move on to Miriam in North York. Thanks for joining us, Miriam.

Miriam: Good morning, God. Firstly, I would like to express my appreciation to you for the miracle of birth. I had my first baby this year, and am still reeling from the sheer brilliance of creation. My question is, there is so much suffering in the world – children starving, villages gobbled from earthquakes, the tsumani – I can't help but wondering, as I praise you in my prayers on Yom Kippur, how you allow this to happen?

God: Yes, mazel tov on your boy, Miriam. He is a precious child. I created the world, imbuing it with the laws of nature, which sometimes cause natural disasters. To some extent, these can be controlled if you and your neighbours took better care of the environment. As per the suffering of children, as an example, the million and a half killed in the Holocaust, this is something that has to be asked of those humans who perpetrated it. I gave them free choice; the ability to make life beautiful or ugly. They chose the second. Miriam, on Yom Kippur, when you pray and and set your goals for the new year, make sure that one of them is to fight as hard as you can to bring peace to the earth. As I told the previous caller, evil will be marginalized if goodness is powerful and grows.

And Miriam, I understand your questioning of my role in these events and, of course, the answer is complex. However, I ask you to remember that on Yom Kippur we – you and I – walk hand in hand as partners, as we did in the creation of the second set of tablets Moses presented to the Jewish people.

Query me and challenge me, but do so as vociferously with yourself. You have it within you to change the world. Ask yourself, if you might be able to do a better job. And thanks for the call.

Host: Well, that wraps it up. We want to thank God for appearing. We wish you would do so more often, perhaps just to reassure us. But maybe that is what Yom Kippur is all about. To my listeners, have a great day, and remember we only need to fast for one day. Imagine those who go hungry every day.

Canadians seek French redress for Auschwitz transports

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Twenty Canadian families, mainly in Toronto and Montreal, have joined more than 400 Jewish families around the world to demand compensation from France and its national railway company for the role they played in sending their relatives to the Auschwitz death camp.

Case involves more than 400 families worldwide

Last week, the case took on new momentum when the lawyer in Paris handling their case, Avi Bitton, sent his second letter of notice to the French government and the Société Nationale des Chemins de fer Français (SNCF), and demanded a reply by Nov. 29.

Bitton dispatched his first letter at the end of August, only to be rebuffed by SNCF. Its chief executive officer said that he would oppose the claim.

Bitton said he will file lawsuits on behalf of his plaintiffs, about half of whom lost relatives during the Holocaust, should SNCF and the French government ignore his second letter.

Bitton does not believe he will receive a satisfactory answer.

"I think they're going to refuse us. If they do so, we'll launch a lawsuit with the courts," said Bitton in a telephone interview from his office in Paris.

The case would then go to trial, and last at least two years, he added.

Bitton decided to contest the case after Alain Lipietz, a Green party member of the European Parliament, and his sister successfully sued the railway and the French government, which holds a majority ownership in SNCF.

Lipietz's father and uncle were shipped by train to the Drancy transit camp near Paris, but survived the war.

Darfur: if not now, when?

By NORMAN L. EPSTEIN

Opinion

The world is teetering shamefully toward a diminished humanity unless we stop the senseless slaughter in Sudan. For more than three years in Darfur, the government of Sudan and its proxy militias have attacked African villages with impunity, causing the death of some 400,000 people and leaving almost three million languishing in internally displaced persons camps.

Despite the government's adamant denial, there is a credible paper trail indicting many in the upper echelons of the Khartoum regime for orchestrating this genocide. In fact, last year, a UN fact-finding mission found many of these influential government members should be tried for crimes against humanity at the International Criminal Court in The Hague. Perversely, we continue to negotiate with the Sudanese

The News in Brief

CANADA

Prof Airs Grievance

TORONTO — A Jewish professor began testifying last week in a grievance hearing against York University for criticizing flyers he distributed that said the school's fundraising arm is biased in favour of Israel. David Noble filed his complaint last year, alleging defamation and violation of his academic freedom and freedom of speech, after the university denounced literature he circulated at a pro-Palestinian event on campus in 2004. The literature, titled "The Tail That Wags the Dog," said the York University Foundation is "biased by the presence of pro-Israel lobyists," and it listed some of its board members and their links to Jewish community groups. Noble is also suing York for $10 million in damages and an apology. He told the hearing that he circulated the literature in defence of a student who was suspended for using a bullhorn at two unauthorized pro-Palestinian rallies on campus. His suspension was later rescinded.

UTT Trial Date Set

MONTREAL — The mother of the youth who firebombed the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs' library will go on trial June 14, more than three years after being charged with being an accessory after the fact. Police allege Rouba El-Merhebi Fahd, 38, tried to help her son Sleiman El-Merhebi flee Canada after the April 2004 attack by seeking to buy him a plane ticket to Brazil. She was freed on $10,000 bail in May 2004 and pleaded not guilty in December 2004. She faces up to seven years in jail. Her son, 20, was released in May after serving two-thirds of a 40-month jail term.

WORLD

Hitler Art Auctioned

LONDON — Artworks attributed to Adolf Hitler sold in Britain for a total of $245,000 (Cdn) – more than double their estimated worth. The 21 items, made during World War I, were sold Sept. 26 by the auction house Jefferys. The works, found in a Belgian farmhouse 60 years after their creation, depict landscapes on the French-Belgian frontier, where Hitler spent the winters of 1916-17 and 1917-18.

Babi Yar Recalled

KIEV — Ukrainian President Viktor Yuschenko marked the 65th anniversary of the Babi Yar massacre. A Sept. 27 ceremony at the ravine involved 1,000 guests from 41 countries. It ended two days of events recalling the 33,000 Jews killed along the ravine's edge on Sept. 29-30, 1941. Israeli President Moshe Katsav, the presidents of Croatia and Montenegro, and official delegations from several nations – as well as Ukrainian officials, rabbis and local and international Jewish leaders – took part in one event in Kiev.

Zionist Pirates?

TEHRAN — A report on Iranian TV said Disney's Pirates of the Caribbean movie series is a tool of the Israel lobby. Referring to Zionism, the July 27 report said the film "is considered another subtle weapon in the hands of those who support this corrupt ideology," the Middle East Media Research Institute reported. As evidence of its claim, the report noted that "7.7 per cent of Disney's board of directors" are Jewish. A report earlier this year aired similar comments about Tom and Jerry cartoons.

CJC Condemns Arson At Muslim School

OTTAWA — Jewish groups have condemned the recent arson at an Ottawa Muslim school that faced controversy in 2005 for a student essay advocating revenge against Israel.

The Sept. 23 fire at the Abraar Islamic School, which occurred on the first day of Ramadan, started in a playground toy box and spread to the exterior of the building, causing an estimated $100,000 in damage. There were no injuries.

Ottawa police said the fire was caused by arson, but added that they found no evidence it was a hate crime.

The school made headlines in 2005 when two of its teachers were disciplined for allegedly praising a student's story about taking revenge on Israel for killing the Hamas spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

Joel Richler, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said that after the Sept. 2 firebombing of a chassidic boys school in Montreal, the Jewish community has a special understanding of the vulnerability now being felt by parents, staff and children at the Abraar School.

"We hope [the] schoolchildren will learn that the immoral acts of a small number do not reflect the values of respect that are shared by most Canadians," Mitchell Bellman, president of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, wrote to the school.

Education report urges funding, structural changes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A newly released report on the future of Toronto's Jewish day schools is advocating a test loan program for tuition, a $100-million education endowment fund, a new body to oversee Jewish schooling, and a study to examine the idea of creating a community-wide middle school in Vaughan.

Seymour Epstein

Those four recommendations are among 23 put forward by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's task force on Jewish education in a study it presented last month to the federation's board.

The task force, co-chaired by volunteers Morris Perlis and Lou Greenbaum, spent 10 months consulting with federation executives and lay leaders, as well as representatives of all local Jewish day schools funded by UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE), a total of 20 day school parents and prospective day school parents, and American BJE leaders and representatives of the U.S.-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education.

The task force's initial objectives included finding ways to spend money more efficiently to support Jewish education, and maximizing the number of young children in day school, Perlis told The CJN in March.

Among the task force's other recommendations are:

- to ensure that all resources possible are provided "to actively and vigorously" pursue government funding;
- to set funding for tuition subsidies to at least current levels (about $7.8 million per year, out of the BJE's $12-million budget);
- to expand co-operation among schools in order to generate cost savings;
- to assess the financial impact on schools that have a larger percentage of subsidized students and develop a strategy to address it; and
- to invest more in strategies to enhance the quality of day school education.

In accordance with the recommendations, the BJE is being "recast into a new entity" that will tentatively be called the Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto, effective July 1, 2007, said Seymour Epstein, the BJE's executive director and the federation's senior vice-president of Jewish education and identity.

Tuition loans, community middle school among proposals

Epstein, who is in charge of implementing the report, said that any specifics about the centre and other recommendations that aren't spelled out in the 34-page document will be examined carefully in the months leading up to next April, when an implementation plan is scheduled to be presented to the UJA Federation board.

He said he didn't know, for example, how schools would be overseen differently by the new Centre for Jewish Education.

The cost of creating such an entity is not known, said federation president David Engel. He added that, "ideally, the centre is not going to become a bureaucracy that will attract funds away from Jewish education."

Among its expanded responsibilities will be to develop marketing plans that highlight the importance of Jewish education and to address perceptions among parents and students that the quality of Jewish education is not as high as the education in other private schools, Engel said.

He stressed that the report contains "some fundamentally big concepts," including "increasing commitment to Jewish education and the importance of Jewish education in our community" as well as the idea of schools working more together.

Also, he added, the report contains a new focus on "parents who… are deciding not to do Jewish [day school] education not only because of funding, but because of the quality of education."

Friendship, scholarship

From the editor's desk

Anyone who finds a faithful friend finds a treasure. Our sages recorded that bit of wisdom many hundreds of years ago. Our own experiences taught us that very same lesson from our earliest days in the schoolyard.

It is not uncommon for friends to walk "that extra mile" for each other. In certain special cases, however, friends might even go half way to the moon and back for each other. The following is a story of such friendship.

The Israeli pilot-and-astronaut Ilan Ramon lived too short a life. It ended, alas, when he and his Columbia crewmates died in their shuttle craft's failed return to earth on Feb. 1, 2003.

The essence of Ilan Ramon was his goodness. His many accomplishments were but a reflection of that essence. It was his goodness, radiating outward from him like a pinwheel casting droplets of sunshine all around, that attracted others.

He had good friends.

And it is very clear, in light of the special cargo carried into space last month by the crew of the shuttle Atlantis, that the astronauts, scientists and technicians of NASA were among them.

As is well known, Ramon took a miniature Torah scroll with him on his mission into space. It belonged to Tel Aviv University professor Yehoyachin Yosef, a survivor of the Shoah who had brought the scroll safely out of Bergen-Belsen.

Ramon wanted the tiny Torah – itself the embodiment of the eternity of the Jewish people – to be with him in space as a living emblem, as it were, of the singular determination and remarkable ability of the Jewish people to shine and achieve, even through the very darkest days. But neither Ilan nor the scroll returned.

Through a confluence of extraordinary circumstances that may or may not have been merely coincidence, Ilan's wife, Rona, learned of the existence of another miniature Torah scroll written by the same sofer (scribe) who wrote Yosef's scroll.

With kindness and understanding of heart, the scroll's owner lent it to Rona, who could now try to complete the mission that had meant so much to Ilan.

Ilan's friends at NASA joyfully, if tearfully, agreed. The Atlantis crew carried the Torah scroll with them into the upper reaches of space as they soared toward the heavens. And this time, they brought it back with them to earth.

"The circle to the stars and back was now closed," Rona said after the crew and the Torah returned safely. "The important message Ilan hoped to convey that humanity has the ability to overcome all hardships and difficulties," was now fulfilled.

That message of optimism and hope is a testament to the character of Ilan Ramon. That it has finally been delivered is a testament to his friends and the everlasting friendship they felt for him.

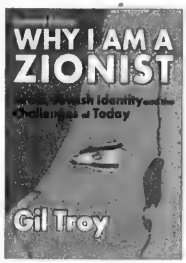
The boisterous, anti-Israel sentiment on campuses throughout the western world, especially since September 2000, has been well documented. The Israeli cause has been unremittingly attacked by an aggressive, mean-spirited confederation of zealous ideologues of all stripes.

It often requires considerable personal self-confidence, resiliency and, at times, courage to be an advocate for Israel and a champion of Jewish rights in the often poisoned, contentious atmosphere of North American campuses. Even students comfortable with their Jewish identity and well-informed on the myriad, complex Middle East issues can experience difficulty when arguing with or, as is more often the case, trying to avoid arguing with people who are anti-Israel.

Imparting information and knowledge to our children is the best way we can help to instil in them the desire and the confidence to stand on Israel's side.

One of the very best resources for that information and knowledge is the book Why I Am A Zionist: Israel, Jewish Identity and the Challenges of Today, by Gil Troy. The book was reviewed in this space four years ago when it was first released in January 2002. Troy has since updated that version. The new edition is expanded and revised.

Harvard-educated, professor of American history and politics at McGill University, Troy is a monthly CJN columnist and one of the most articulate, eloquent and impassioned spokespeople anywhere in the world on behalf of Israel. His skill at marshalling facts and weaving arguments is masterful.



His book is a compact yet comprehensive primer on how and why to be a supporter of Israel. It is a perfect handbook for the individual, whether or not a student on campus, who wishes to educate himself or herself regarding the case for Israel. It also provides tips on "how to talk about Israel on campus and elsewhere."

One of the additions to the text is a pithy, two-page chapter explaining "Why Israel has every right to exist." In light of the fact that more and more people are being heard these days echoing the calumny that Israel's creation was a mistake, these 1,000 words alone are worth the cost of the book.

The book is published by the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre in Montreal and can be ordered by sending an e-mail to bjec@bjec.org or to michael@dershowitzgroup.com

Royalties from the sale of the book are donated to help terror victims and their families. All other profits are donated to the birthright israel program. –MBD

BABI YAR REMEMBERED

Israeli President Moshe Katsav, left, his Ukrainian counterpart Viktor Yushchenko and Yushchenko's wife, Kataryna, last week attended a wreath-laying ceremony at a monument in the forest of Babi Yar near Kyiv, in the Ukraine, commemorating the massacre of Jews there 65 years ago. Some 33,000 Jews were killed there by the Nazis over a period of some five days from Sept. 29 to Oct. 3 in 1941.

Fund set up for family of missing boater

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A volunteer committee has established a fund to help support the family of a Toronto man who is presumed to have drowned on Lake Nipissing.

It's been more than a month since Eli Horowitz, 30, and his father-in-law Heine Mondrowitz, 56, went missing during a fishing trip near North Bay.

Although Mondrowitz's body was found a week after their rented, 19-foot boat drifted ashore empty near the lakeside community, Horowitz's body has yet to be found.

David Stein, a good friend of Horowitz and a fellow paramedic with Hatzolah, has been instrumental in keeping the search going.

He and Hatzolah, a volunteer emergency medical service for the Orthodox community that Horowitz helped found in Toronto, have offered a reward of $10,000 for the recovery of his body.

Stein said the search by air, land and water is continuing and that he is still in touch with the Ontario Provincial Police.

"The OPP believes very strongly that he is underwater," said Stein, who vowed the search will continue until Horowitz's body is recovered.

Meanwhile, Horowitz's wife and three children, all under age five, are relying on the community to help them through this difficult time.

Horowitz supported his family by running a small paint business, but because he had cystic fibrosis, a respiratory disease, he was not able to get life insurance.

A 20-person committee consisting of friends of the family and "concerned people in the community" was set up last month to try to provide Horowitz's young family with a modest income.

Mark Rosenblatt, Horowitz's friend and one of the volunteers who helped establish the Eli Horowitz Fund, said he wanted to make sure the family will be looked after.

"We're trying to put together a fund that will be administered by a group of trustees, and hopefully we'll raise enough that they can live modestly on the income," Rosenblatt said, adding that the goal is to raise a lump sum within the next two months and invest it.

Rabbi Yitzchak Feigenbaum, who also sits on the committee, said that while many people are volunteering their time and effort for this cause, businessmen Philip Reichmann and Nathan Uhr are the two main players who are making the fund happen.

"They are the ones who are administrating it and setting it up so that it runs properly, that the money is distributed in the right fashion," Rabbi Feigenbaum said. "They are the main movers and shakers, just out of the goodness of their hearts. I don't even think they knew Eli. They are just doing this as a community service for a family that needs our help."

Horowitz, who was originally from Toronto but grew up in Monsey, N.Y., before moving back to Toronto eight years ago, was very involved in the community, Rosenblatt said.

"He was the type of guy who would do anything for anyone. That's just the type of guy that he was. The community came first in his eyes."

"He was altruistic..He was a very community-minded person. He was a Hatzolah volunteer, notwithstanding he had a lot of difficulties in his own life, he always found time for other people," Rabbi Feigenbaum said.

"And he always had a smile. You would never know that he had difficulties in his own life. He was a very accepting person, a non-judgmental kind of guy," he added.

He said that the initiative to raise money for the family can be tricky because while the committee is trying to get the word out about the fund, they also want to to be as sensitive to the family as possible.

"We want to be discreet but professional," Rabbi Feigenbaum said.

He added that the family is doing as well as can be expected under the circumstances.

"The kids are in school, his wife goes about her business, but it is a difficult time because they are still in limbo. The search continues."

He said that while the committee wants to avoid high-profile, "splashy" fundraising events, if anyone is interested in hosting a small gathering to raise some money for the family, they can contact the committee.

Outrageous calumnies

As we wrote last week in this space, the United Nations has so methodically disqualified itself as an organization of fairness, balance, justice and timely, effective response to international crisis that it offers no hope for the flowering, let alone growth, of world peace.

The most blatant example of the organization's institutional unfairness is its obsessive singling out of Israel for repeated condemnation and censure. Last week, that obsession was again on display.

At a meeting of the Human Rights Council in Geneva, UN human rights envoy John Dugard accused Israel of turning the Gaza Strip into a prison and repeated earlier charges that Israel was breaking international law with its actions in the Gaza Strip. "Israel violates international law as expounded by the Security Council and the International Court of Justice and goes unpunished. But the Palestinian people are punished for having democratically elected a regime unacceptable to Israel, the U.S. and the EU," Dugard said.

Dugard is well known for his anti-Israel tirades over the years. Indeed, his allegations against the Jewish state have been so full of invective and incendiary statements that the Anti-Defamation League called for his dismissal in March of this year and in October 2004.

Last week Dugard also criticized Canada, the United States and western European countries for cutting off funding to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas' victory in legislative elections last January.

As demagogic and dangerous as Dugard's allegations are, they are also quite fatuous and hollow. The process by which Hamas was elected to govern the Palestinians was indeed important, but far more important are the policies by which Hamas chooses to govern.

Avoiding a government that refuses to recognize Israel, advocates violence against the Jewish state and aligns itself with blood-crazed, anti-western terror groups is not only legitimate, it is quite appropriate.

The Austrian people elected Joerg Haider and his Freedom Party in March 2004 to govern the province of Carinthia. But other countries in Europe and elsewhere refused to have any dealings with him. In light of his troubling, fascist policies and background, they had every right – and were right – to do so. Eventually, he stepped aside.

Why should Canadian taxpayers send money to a government that espouses the annihilation of Israel and its people; that since its election has sent a regular barrage of Qassam rockets against Israel; and that refuses to return the soldier its forces kidnapped from Israeli soil?

Similarly, why should the brazen, anti-Israel bias of a man such as John Dugard still be the norm at the United Nations and its many agencies? The fact that it is, and that he and others like him can still peddle his outrageous calumnies against Israel under the seal and imprimatur of the United Nations, is further sad proof that the organization is a moral wreckage and in perpetual violation of its precious, but now degraded, purposes and principles.

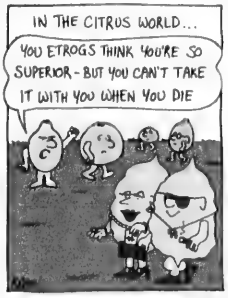
NDP policy on Hezbollah

At its recent annual policy conference convention, the New Democratic Party adopted a motion that stated, "Hezbollah is a recognized political party and… there should be a comprehensive peace process that brings all state and non-state parties to the table" ("NDP resolution slams Israel," CJN, Sept. 21)

Hezbollah is an armed subsidiary of the Islamic fascist state of Iran and is rightly listed as a terrorist organization by the United States, Canada and many other countries worldwide. The leader of Hezbollah, Hassan Nasrallah, chillingly suggested in a May 2003 New York Times article that if all the Jews returned to Israel, it would make their job easier rather than having to hunt them down worldwide. Hezbollah has been repeatedly condemned for using civilians as human shields in their armed conflict with the State of Israel, and uses an immoral terrorist tactic in lieu of conventional, and legal, armed warfare.



So, the Toronto Board of Rabbis joins many Canadians in wondering why NDP leader Jack Layton and his party would wish to see this group part of any peace process. It would seem to the rational mind that Hezbollah is part of the problem, and not part of any just solution. One would hope that the NDP would embrace a policy that reflects this great country's desire for peace, and morality.

Positive elements of NDP resolutions

Your reporter quotes parts of the two resolutions that were adopted at the New Democratic Party's recent annual policy conference convention, as well as quoting parts of eliminated earlier drafts ("NDP resolution slams Israel," CJN, Sept. 21).

He overlooks positive elements of what was adopted, including "support for a two-state solution with Israelis and Palestinians living safely… in independent states with secure borders" and for Canada to take a " pro-active role" in bringing all parties into the peace process. The resolution condemns all "acts of violence against civilians" and "all acts of terror" including "suicide bombings." The Palestine Authority and Israel are called upon to abide by UN resolutions.

On the Lebanon situation, the NDP says that Hezbollah "retains the capacity to strike at Israel's northern towns and cities." It challenges Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his uncritical support of Israel and presses for federal government advocacy of a comprehensive peace process "bringing all state and non-state parties to the table" to resolve regional conflicts.

The NDP resolutions certainly criticize Israel, but I believe that NDP foreign affairs critic Alexa McDonough succeeded in removing the anti-Israel elements from the earlier drafts brought to the convention.

Torah Judaism will thrive

Although Rabbi Shlomo Miller appears to be a target of much of the frustration expressed in your recent two-part series about Orthodoxy in Toronto ("Toronto's Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" CJN, Aug. 24 and 31), it should be noted that all the trends mentioned affect the larger Orthodox world – and in particular, its Israeli and American centres – and are not in any way restricted to Toronto or its rabbis.

Secondly, the changes going on in the Orthodox world, and the pitch of debate that they have generated, are indications of the seriousness with which Orthodox Jews approach their religion. This is a healthy sign and points to a vigorous future, in spite of predictions of some of the naysayers you quoted in the series and subsequent letters. Torah Judaism will survive and thrive because of the passion of those who take it seriously.

Israeli chutzpah

Martin Kalson criticizes the Toronto Orthodox community for being obsessed with supposedly minor issues ("Toronto's Orthodox community, letter, CJN, Sept. 7). His accusations display an ignorance of our community and the chutzpah associated with Israelis who seem to know everyone else's business better than their own.

Yes, we know there was a war in Israel this summer. Toronto's Jewish community was deeply affected and responded, financially and otherwise, in the typical superlative fashion. We've been doing it for years, war or no war, in case he didn't know. He should write letters to his government asking why they do such a poor public relations job in portraying Israel's position to the world media and not countering the lies and propaganda that the Arabs feed the same media.

As for his boasting about the achdut (unity) that existed between the various religious and non-religious factions during the war, the only time there is such achdut is when there is a war and Israel is under attack. The rest of the time, there are bitter disputes and confrontations between the religious and non-religious. I would not be so proud of an achdut that is brought about only as a result of the actions of our enemies.

Perspectives

A modern Orthodox manifesto

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

A few weeks ago, The CJN ran an informative two-part series that addressed the tensions between modern Orthodox and non-modern Orthodox Jews in Toronto.

Since one of the articles quoted me, a number of Torontonians have recently asked me whether there really is such a thing as modern Orthodoxy in Toronto, and, if so, where is it? Some wondered if modern Orthodoxy is an oxymoron, like "kosher pig" or "postal service."

Martin Lockshin

I may be an incorrigible optimist, but I see some positive developments in modern Orthodoxy in North America. Before I outline them, I will define my terms. Admittedly, my definition of what modern Orthodoxy is – or should be – is not the only one possible, but, for the record, here it is.

• Modern Orthodoxy is unabashedly Orthodox Judaism. It's not "Orthodox Judaism lite." It involves prayer three times a day, intensive study of Torah, and making life decisions – even on delicate, personal matters – based on traditional Halachah (Jewish law). Modern Orthodoxy does not see personal autonomy as a value, but rather prefers "heteronomy," that is, allowing something else (God's Torah) to influence our decisions and make our lives holier and more fulfilling.

• A modern Orthodox Jew feels that the State of Israel is a positive religious value. Aliyah is seen as the fulfilment of a mitzvah (a religious duty). Modern Orthodox Jews who have not yet made aliyah support Israel in any way that they can. And they believe that the language of the State of Israel – modern Hebrew, the language now spoken by more than half of the world's Jews – is a holy language.

Hebrew, of course, has changed much over the last three millennia. But modern Hebrew is the national language of the Jewish people in its most recent incarnation. As such, modern Orthodox Jews see fluency in modern Hebrew as a crucial Jewish value.

• Modern Orthodox Jews in Canada feel that it's their Jewish duty to take part in public life here. They should feel empowered not just to lobby for the State of Israel or for day school funding (although those are important causes), but also to try to make Canada a better country for all of its citizens – striving to eliminate poverty, ignorance, corruption and discrimination. It should go without saying that modern Orthodox Jews see it as their religious duty to pay the taxes that are required by our government.

• Modern Orthodox Jews should see it as their Jewish duty to do what they can to help those in need in other countries, for example, by fighting illiteracy, AIDS-HIV and poverty. And as Jews living after the Holocaust, we have a particular duty to get involved in preventing genocide wherever it may be occurring.

• In a modern Orthodox synagogue, men and women don't have identical roles. Men and women sit separately, separated by a mechitzah. But a modern Orthodox synagogue takes steps to make women more involved in communal religious life than they were in pre-modern times. A modern Orthodox synagogue has a women's section from which the women can see and hear as well as the men can. In a modern Orthodox synagogue, men and women study Torah together. All classes, even Talmud classes, are open to both women and men. All classes may be taught by women or men.

In a modern Orthodox synagogue, women and men serve on the board and the executive.

In a modern Orthodox synagogue, laypeople – both women and men – can make announcements or teach Torah from the bimah in the sanctuary.

In a modern Orthodox synagogue, rabbis strive to find new ways, while still conforming to Jewish law, to involve women in religious activities. In some such synagogues, women read the megillah on the holiday of Purim. In others, they participate in some form of Torah reading, or dance with a Torah scroll on Simchat Torah. While modern Orthodox leaders are still trying to work out boundaries for such activities, what all modern Orthodox people have in common is a sincere desire to find new ways to accommodate the spiritual needs of women.

• Modern Orthodox Jews believe in the words of the classical rabbis that wisdom is found among the gentiles. Study of secular subjects is not seen as forbidden. It's appropriate to study and learn to appreciate the great works of world culture: prose, poetry, science, music and art. That is why modern Orthodox Jews are lifelong learners of Jewish texts, of modern sciences and of the humanities. They do not shy away from controversial topics. They disdain simplistic, glib answers.

A teacher or a rabbi in a modern Orthodox synagogue will draw on secular wisdom, not just to contrast it in an unflattering manner with Jewish teachings. Quotations from Shakespeare, and even from great writers who were not friends of the Jews, such as T.S. Eliot, are appreciated in a sermon, as are analyses of opinion pieces by journalists such as Margaret Wente or Robert Fulford (even if they do not discuss Israel).

• A modern Orthodox synagogue is proudly Orthodox, but it strives to be welcoming to all Jews. The synagogue promotes meticulous halachic Sabbath observance, but it welcomes, in a non-condescending manner, members or guests who drive to the synagogue on Saturday.

The rabbi in a modern Orthodox synagogue will realize that not everyone there is learned. He will give sermons that can be understood by all. When he uses Hebrew, Yiddish and Aramaic phrases, he is careful to translate every word into English.

• Modern Orthodox Jews realize that they do not live alone. Accordingly, a modern Orthodox synagogue will host guest lecturers who are not Orthodox and ones who are not Jewish if they have messages that help promote the synagogue's values or advance the education of the congregation.

Modern Orthodox Jews are eager to cooperate with haredi Jews. They will accept some compromises for the sake of unity, but will not allow the more insular approach to win out consistently.

Modern Orthodox Jews believe in tolerance.

The author believes that a modern Orthodox Jew feels that the State of Israel is a positive religious value. [RNS/Reuters photo]

They are saddened, and occasionally upset, by the treatment that they receive from those haredi Jews who try to destroy the careers of some modern Orthodox rabbis by labelling them heretics, who work behind the scenes to try to make modern Orthodox educational programs fail, who phone out-of-town rabbis and tell them not to appear at local modern Orthodox venues and who seek out Orthodox university students to warn them of the dangers of studying Judaism with modern Orthodox scholars. (All of these things have occurred here in Toronto.) Modern Orthodox Jews wish to be treated with tolerance, but they themselves still extend tolerance to the intolerant.

Modern Orthodox Jews seek out ways to cooperate with the non-Orthodox when possible on issues of mutual concern, so long as we do not have to abandon our values. Modern Orthodox Jews treat non-Orthodox rabbis – both women and men – with respect, as leaders of large segments of the Jewish people.

• With all their openness to the outside world, modern Orthodox Jews oppose intermarriage as a serious sin and as a grave danger to the Jewish people. They don't seek out converts to Judaism, but when potential converts come to them, they adopt positions of the more lenient halachic authorities in reaching out to them.

• Modern Orthodox Jews respect the quest of all Jews who are sincerely trying to find God and live a life of the spirit in ways other than modern Orthodoxy. They are often very impressed by the deep fear of God demonstrated by some haredi Jews who have rejected the modern world and dedicated themselves solely to the study of Torah, recognizing that sometimes their accomplishments in depth of Torah knowledge are remarkable.

Nevertheless, when modern Orthodox Jews need, as they often do, to consult with Torah scholars on halachic issues, they will first seek out scholars who subscribe to the tenets of modern Orthodoxy as listed above, rabbis who have deep knowledge both of the world and of the law, rabbis who believe in the principle that "koach dehetera adif," that the knowledgeable scholar will rule leniently on issues of law when possible and will not decide to follow the stricter path simply "to be safe" or to avoid criticism from the religious right.

Is the description above of modern Orthodoxy based in reality? Is modern Orthodoxy gaining in strength or slipping into oblivion here in Canada?

The pessimists appear to have a case. Not long ago, there was a chapter of the Rabbinical Council of America in Toronto – a group of university-educated rabbis who gathered together to advance the cause of non-haredi Orthodoxy. It no longer functions. These days university-educated Orthodox leaders often kowtow to the haredi worldview.

Some people worry that developments here in Toronto are just part of an international phenomenon in Jewish, Christian and Muslim circles, where there has been enormous growth in the popularity of the kind of "old-time religion" that eschews intellectualism, avoids nuance and provides simplistic feel-good answers.

But there are also reasons for optimism. Here in Toronto and throughout North America, there are several synagogues that incorporate some or many of the tenets listed above. And I believe that in the future, there will be even more modern Orthodox Jews and modern Orthodox synagogues.

Here and elsewhere, observant lay people are coming together to form new minyanim, and sometimes new synagogues. First-rate educational outfits such as Torah in Motion in Toronto and Drisha in New York reflect the strength, depth and vibrancy of modern Orthodoxy. Their effect will inevitably be felt. Successful day schools that teach modern Orthodoxy, such as Netivot HaTorah and the Bnei Akiva high schools in Toronto, are producing more and more graduates who are not likely to be pleased with the status quo. Finally, the new and unabashedly modern Orthodox rabbinical school in Manhattan, Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, continues to produce top-quality rabbis with excellent pastoral skills, deep Torah knowledge and openness to the world in which we live.

I can't help thinking that all these factors mean that a better future awaits modern Orthodoxy. In a few years, The CJN might have to run another series of articles about the surprising growth of dynamic modern Orthodoxy in Canada.

Martin Lockshin is a modern Orthodox Jew. He is also a professor of humanities and Hebrew at York University and an ordained rabbi.

Opinions

Bring them home

Does your conscience bother you? Well, it should. I have my own blunders to reflect on during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. But some failures are communal, and this year, our entire community's conscience should be troubled. We have forgotten our captive sons.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev are still being held prisoner by Hamas and Hezbollah. The Red Cross can't visit them, and there's been no independent verification of their condition. No one knows if they're alive or dead.

Israel went to war because of these three young men. The war has left the country with a huge casualty total, and still, Gilad, Ehud and Eldad are not home.

Of course, there was no guarantee the war would bring the captives freedom. But what's happened since the end of the war? The captives are not exactly the cause celebre of the Jewish world. There have been rallies in Tel Aviv and New York. Is that all we can expect from a people who believe that each Jew is responsible for the other?

Freeing captives is a fundamental Jewish value. The Exodus narrative instils in Jews a profound love of freedom. Exile made the ransoming of slaves an all-too-common event, and a communal priority. Most importantly, the commandment to free captives is rooted in kinship and community.

Kinship is the starting point of Jewish identity. Abraham risks his life to save his nephew Lot from captivity. Actually, he can't stand Lot, but family is family, and saving Lot is his responsibility. (Years later, Abraham's great-grandchildren will commit the cardinal sin of kinship and sell their brother into slavery. For that sin, the Jewish people will be exiled to Egypt).

Jews throughout the ages have emulated Abraham and gone to heroic lengths to free their captive brethren. In the Middle Ages, Jews emptied their savings to ransom captives. In 1286, the Jewish community collected 23,000 marks (the equivalent of $15 million today) to ransom Rabbi Meir of Rothenberg. (Rabbi Meir refused to allow them to pay the ransom).

Israel's history is also filled with dramatic rescue efforts such as Entebbe and Operation Solomon, as well as lopsided prisoner exchanges. Jews don't ignore their captive brothers.

Today, we must raise our voices to help Gilad, Ehud and Eldad. We must mention their names at every Jewish event, pray for them every Shabbat, and write letters to our MPs. We need to support their families, and we must march on the Iranian Embassy in Ottawa.

It's time for the Jewish community to take responsibility for the captives. We need to let the world know that their continued captivity is an outrage. We need to bring Gilad, Ehud and Eldad home.

A wake-up call for Quebec Jews

Montreal has long fancied itself the "Paris of North America," but this is ridiculous. Many Quebecers reacted harshly to Israel's justified war against Hezbollah this past summer. Leading Quebec politicians marched against Israel while some protesters waved Hezbollah's flag. Shame on those who waved that flag ignorant of Hezbollah's terrorism. Shame, too, on those who waved the flag conscious of Hezbollah's genocidal desire to destroy Israel.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Alas, these people were shameless. I and others who defended Israel, including that great Canadian, MP Irwin Cotler, endured anti-Semitic – not "just" anti-Zionist – attacks. Many were of the "you don't belong here anyway" variety. Even after the Mideast ceasefire, anti-Jewish violence erupted in Montreal. The Friday night before Labour Day, shortly after a dozen yeshiva students exited, a masked man firebombed the Skver-Toldos Jewish Boys School, scorching the entrance. Clearly, the mask reflects premeditation. Yet officials refused to pronounce it a "hate crime," because they found no anti-Jewish note or graffiti.

That same week, a flight attendant threw a chassidic man off a Montreal-to-New York flight, apparently for praying. Air Canada has not adequately explained what occurred or apologized properly to the Jewish community.

More broadly, a survey commissioned by the Association for Canadian Studies found many that Quebecers are soft on Jihadists. In Quebec, 77 per cent of respondents deemed 9/11 "a response to U.S. policy," and 38 per cent blamed Israel, at least partly. As well, fifty-three per cent wanted Canada to "be more sensitive to the concerns of terrorist organizations in the Middle East."

Can we connect these dots? Did something change this summer, or did longstanding realities become more obvious? Let's not exaggerate. Jews live freely and peacefully in Montreal. But are we discovering pockets of Jew-hatred fomenting in Quebec? At best, do most Quebecers echo Count de Clermont-Tonnerre's French Revolutionary sentiments: "We must refuse everything to the Jews as a nation and accord everything to Jews as individuals?" The community must debate this situation candidly.

The community also needs an honest, self-critical debate about how to respond to this new, or perhaps renewed, anti-Semitism. Cowering behind security guards and security cameras is not the answer. This summer, to my embarrassment, Montreal was one of the first and few communities to rush back participants from Israeli summer programs when the war with Hezbollah began. Rather than rallying behind Israel in the tens of thousands outside and downtown, Montreal held an indoor "town hall" meeting. People became so skittish that when one school cleaned its outdoor sign, some parents suggested removing such a big sign that says "Jewish" from the school's building. And when the National Post's Barbara Kay courageously wrote a column that "the reflexive anti-Americanism and a fat streak of anti-Semitism that has marbled the intellectual discourse of Quebec throughout its history" risks creating a new, ugly "Quebecistan," few Jews defended her when the Francophone press vilified her.

We do not risk recreating 1930s Germany, but 1970s Montreal, when thousands of Jews fled down the 401, fearing the separatists. We may not be "pure laine," pure "old stock" Quebec wool, but we cannot be the local lambs. We must not be North America's "Jews of silence," nor the latest generation to "cut and run." Nor should we become angry crusaders who overreact to the smallest slight, real or imagined.

Judaism should not be a fighting faith. It must be an enriching way of life. Yes, we should defend our community, but we must also do a better job of explaining "why bother" to ourselves and our children.

While standing up strongly for our rights, the time has come for a communal renaissance, a "re-Jew-venation." Now more than ever, we need a unity based on commitment, intelligence, literacy and vision. Now more than ever, we need to teach our children about Jewish pride, Jewish values, Jewish texts, Jewish holidays and Jewish life. Now more than ever, we need to adapt to modern needs, reinvigorate our Jewish institutions and stretch our Jewish souls.

Bigotry should be fought politically and spiritually, by reacting and affirming. To paraphrase Hillel, if we don't react and protect our rights, who are we? But if we don't affirm who we are and why we do what we do, what are we? And if not now, when?

Standing up for ourselves, and others

When I learned about the brutal attack on a 12-year old British girl on a London bus this summer by a group of British young people, I felt as if I had been sucked into a rupture in the space/time continuum. It seemed to me that this frightening event in 2006 England was somewhere between 1946 Kielce, Poland, and 1964 Queens, N.Y.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

I was in the midst of reading historian Jan Gross's new book, Fear, a devastating account of postwar anti-Semitism in Poland, with an extended account of the brutal massacre in the city of Kielce of the remnant of Jews who had survived the Nazi genocide. When I learned of the beating in London, I couldn't help thinking of the events that Gross recounts. I thought, too, of the assault on a woman named Kitty Genovese in the Queens neighbourhood of Kew Gardens.

For those who missed the news item about the British girl, she was beaten unconscious on Aug. 11 by four older teenage girls after they asked her whether she was Jewish. Sensing danger, she replied that she was "fully English." Still, the gang surrounded the Jewish 12-year-old, punching and kicking her and throwing her to the floor of the bus.

Newspapers reported that one of the attackers stomped on her face with such force that her eye socket was fractured. The gang didn't harm the girl's friend, who, one report said, was wearing rosary beads. Throughout the assault, and with both young girls screaming, no one on the bus came to their assistance – not even the bus driver.

I'm not suggesting that London is Kielce. I don't like such facile and sensational – and thoughtless – analogies. Today's United Kingdom is not postwar Poland. But from the perspective of the person assaulted, there is this similarity: both were brutal attacks perpetrated for sheer pleasure by a group that vastly outnumbered its victims, overpowering through the force of numbers and the passion of hatred. In Kielce, the attack was licensed by a tacit idea that brutalizing Jews is acceptable, socially and morally, and that whatever legal restraints pertain will not be enforced by those nearby. So it was, too, for the girl in London.

As devastating for the surviving Kielce victims as the attack itself was the realization that no one would come to their aid. Similarly, several weeks into recovery from the serious injuries she sustained, the London girl reflected that what has stayed with her, and is most disturbing, is that no one on the bus responded to her cries for help.

It's clear from the accounts of what happened that racial or religious hatred motivated the assault. But what of the response of others on the bus? When the girl and her friend attempted to pull open the doors of the bus to escape their attackers, the bus driver kept the doors closed. Was that, too, part of an atmosphere of hate? A number of studies have cited a rise in anti-semitic episodes in the United Kingdom.

More likely, what underwrote the non-involvement of the bystanders on the London bus was something closer to the mixture of fear, apathy and callousness that explained why neighbours ignored the cries of 29-year-old Kitty Genovese as she was assaulted and ultimately stabbed to death near her home one night in 1964. The "Genovese syndrome," or bystander effect, was epitomized by one neighbour who told reporters that he simply didn't want to get involved.

In addition to continued concern for the well-being of the British girl, and compassion for what she has suffered, I believe we come away from this terrible event with two thoughts. First, we must take anti-Semitism seriously as a 21st century plague and work to counter it. Second, we must not become bystanders ourselves, too apathetic or too fearful to take a stand when the harm does not concern us directly, but affects someone else, or some other people.

This is a quintessentially Jewish concept, most succinctly articulated long ago by Hillel: "Im ein ani li, mi li? Uk'she'ani li l'atsmi, ma ani?" "If I am not for myself, who is for me? And when I am only for myself, what am I?"

The Kirshner File

Muslim radicalism in Britain is a problem

Ahmed Omar Saeed Sheikh was a cold-hearted killer, but on the surface, he seemed like a perfectly adjusted, upwardly mobile, well spoken member of Britain's 1.8-million-strong Muslim community.

Born in London, the son of a Pakistani merchant who immigrated to Britain in the 1950s, he attended a private school and studied statistics at the London School of Economics. In 1993, he visited Bosnia as an aid worker, and there he met hardened Arab veterans of the wars in Afghanistan who converted him to Islamic radicalism. A year later, he was arrested in India, having been charged with kidnapping four Western tourists. Released from prison in 1999, he got married and settled down in Lahore, Pakistan. Sheikh, however, was not cut out for the routines of domestic tranquility. In 2002, he planned the abduction and murder of Daniel Pearl, a young American Jewish correspondent on assignment in Pakistan for the Wall Street Journal.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Once his identity as Pearl's murderer was disclosed, commentators in Britain expressed shock that someone as acculturated and integrated in British society as Sheikh could have committed so heinous a crime.

Sheikh is representative of the second and third generation of British Muslims and Christian converts to Islam who have embraced the anti-Western, anti-liberal, anti-modern, anti-Israel and anti-Semitic agenda of Islamic fundamentalism. Although he was born and bred in Britain, he vehemently rejected mainstream secular values and went his own way, like other jihadists who have committed crimes in the name of Islam.

The incidents they are associated with are indelibly carved into the annals of Muslim rage against the West, though it must be noted that the vast majority of British Muslims are law-abiding citizens. (Last week, a survey commissioned by the mass-circulation News of the World found that 68 per cent of British Muslims said they would inform police if they suspected that a fellow Muslim was involved in a terrorist attack.)

Not long after Sheikh kidnapped, tortured and beheaded Pearl, two middle-class British Muslims of Pakistani descent recruited by Al Qaeda, Asif Mohammed Hanif, 22, and Omar Khan Sharif, 27, checked into a hotel in Tel Aviv. On April 30, 2003, Hanif walked into Mike's Place, a cafe and pub on the Tel Aviv promenade facing the Mediterranean Sea, and blew himself up, killing three civilians and wounding over 50. Hanif thus became the first European suicide bomber to perpetrate havoc in Israel. His accomplice, Sharif, tried to detonate a bomb in a nearby hotel, but it failed to explode, and he fled the scene. On May 12, his body washed ashore on Tel Aviv's beachfront.

Richard Reid, the son of a British mother and a Jamaican father, was a petty thief who spent much of his adolescence in prisons. Then he turned to Islam, becoming a devout Muslim and an Al Qaeda sympathizer. On Dec. 22, 2001, about three months after 19 Arab hijackers crashed four American commercial aircraft into the World Trade Center in Manhattan, the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and a field in Pennsylvania, Reid boarded an American Airlines flight in Paris bound for Miami. Before he could activate a bomb in his shoes, he was overpowered, and a disaster was averted.

Mohammed Sidique Khan, 30, was the oldest of the four Muslims responsible for the most serious terrorist incident in British history. On July 7, 2005, they detonated bombs on three subway trains and a bus in central London, killing 52 people and injuring more than 700. Khan, born in Leeds to a Pakistani foundry labourer, was a youth outreach worker. In a video statement released by the police after his self-inflicted death, he described himself as "a soldier" and hailed "martyrs" who had given their lives in defence of Islam.

Mohammed Sidique Khan

The emergence of homegrown Muslim terrorists in Britain is a worrisome trend. But it's really a Europe-wide phenomenon. Mohammed Bouyeri, a Dutch Muslim of Moroccan ancestry, murdered the filmmaker Theo van Gogh in Amsterdam in 2004. The jihadists who killed 191 commuters in Madrid two years ago were Spanish citizens. These events prompted French scholar Gilles Kepel to write in The War for Muslim Minds: Islam and the West (Harvard University Press), "Europe has emerged as the primary battlefield in which the future of global Islam will be decided."

Kepel's claim may be overstated. Iraq and Afghanistan may yet be the crucibles where this issue is played out. But there is little doubt that one of the battlefields will be the European continent, which is home to some 23 million Muslims, or about five per cent of the total population.

By 2025, Europe's Muslim population is expected to double, given continued immigration and high Muslim fertility rates. Some projections, based on a continuation of current trends, plus declines in the non-Muslim population, foresee a Muslim majority in France – which has the largest proportion of Muslims – and perhaps in all of Europe by 2050.

Abu Hamza al-Masri

Robert Leiken, author of Bearers of Jihad? Immigration and National Security After 9/11, says the mass migration of Muslims to Europe was an unintended consequence of post-World War II guest worker programs.

It was thought that these workers would remain in Europe temporarily, but family reunification programs, generous welfare and housing benefits, free language courses and a high standard of living persuaded them to stay on.

Today, most immigrants in western Europe, including Holland, Germany, Belgium and France, are Muslim. And while many of them are willing to integrate, some younger, militant, unassimilated Muslims reject the minority status to which their parents or grandparents acquiesced, says Leiken.

More often than not, these militants – having been influenced by developments in Bosnia, Afghanistan, Iraq and the Arab-Israeli conflict – hold views on religion and the state, gender equality and freedom of expression that are diametrically at odds with their respective host societies.

Last month, British Home Secretary John Reid gave voice to these concerns when he warned Muslim parents to watch their children for signs of extremism in the "battle for values."

Beyond such warnings, the British government has taken further steps to contain Muslim radicals.

The Terrorist Act, passed this year in response to the 2005 bombings in London, is designed to discourage the "fostering of hate" and the "advocating of violence to further a person's beliefs." Groups and organizations can be banned and mosques where radical Islam is disseminated can be closed.

"Let no one be in any doubt," Prime Minister Tony Blair said. "The rules of the game have changed."

Some Muslim and civil liberty spokespeople claim that the Terrorist Act will increase tensions, alienate Muslims and play into the hands of terrorists. But their misgivings have not stopped the authorities from cracking down on suspected terrorists and banning extremist groups.

On Aug. 21, the government announced terrorism and murder-conspiracy charges against 11 Muslims in an alleged plot to blow up trans-Atlantic airliners. On Sept. 2, the police detained 14 Muslim men in London and Manchester in raids aimed at nipping potential terrorist schemes in the bud.

Earlier this year, Britain imprisoned Mustafa Kamel Mustafa for seven years after he was found guilty of inciting murder and race hatred from his platform at the Finsbury Park Mosque in London. Otherwise known as Abu Hamza al-Masri, the fiery Egyptian cleric justified the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and branded Jews as the "enemy of Islam."

Britain also issued a deportation order against Abu Qatada, a Jordanian cleric of Palestinian origin who was alleged to be a spiritual guide to Al Qaeda.

Omar Bakri Mohammed, a Syrian national who was granted political asylum and became a legal resident of Britain in 1993 after his deportation from Saudi Arabia, left London abruptly in August 2005 when the government announced its intention to prosecute imams who preach violence. Mohammed was the founder of two extremist groups accused of being anti-Jewish: Al-Muhajiroun and Hizb ut-Tahir.

Recently, a British parliamentary group chaired by politician Denis MacShane issued a report warning that anti-Semitism in Britain is on the rise.

The report concluded that "a minority of Islamist extremists... do incite hatred toward Jews," but it added that even middle-of-the-road organizations such as the Muslim Council of Britain, which has called for the abolition of Holocaust Memorial Day, are riddled with problematic attitudes that could affect British Jews.

Richard Diamond to visit all Canadian campuses in the next two years

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA Federation

Richard Diamond has only been chair of National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) for three months, but he has already begun to make the rounds on campus. The 46-year-old has already checked out the Jewish student scene at Université du Québec à Montréal and The University of Western Ontario in London. His goal is to visit every campus across the country over the next two years.

NJCL is a national coordinating body of Hillel across Canada, funded by Jewish Federations through UIA Federations Canada. It also serves as the campus advocacy arm of CIJA.

The trips are part of Diamond's plan to develop suitable Israel advocacy and Jewish identity programming on campus.

"This generation of kids on campus looks at Israel and looks at its Jewishness very differently from the older members of the community," Diamond says. "It behooves us as leaders to understand what drives these kids, what their issues are, where their priorities are, what their goals are."

But, says Diamond, a member of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board, NJCL's Israel advocacy work is not limited to Jewish students. "It's equally important to advocate to the non-Jewish student community so that they too can become advocates for Israel. This is not easy but it's essential to creating a pro-Israel atmosphere in this country."

Richard Diamond

With that thought in mind, NJCL is taking a "shared values" approach to Israel advocacy, in which it discusses subjects such as the quest for peace, the principles of democracy, education, family, and free enterprise.

"These are the values of Israel, these are the values of the Jewish people, and, indeed, these are the values of Canadians," says Diamond.

Regarding anti-Israel sentiment on campus this semester, "it's been relatively quiet," Diamond says of the campuses served by NJCL. But he is not convinced that it's going to remain that way and NJCL has prepared materials to combat potential flare-ups in response to this past summer's war with Hezbollah.

Diamond has also been meeting with administrators to ensure that schools remain safe for students.

"There's no problem having a discussion about the various issues on campus, but it's got to be in an atmosphere of respect and mutual consideration," says Diamond.

Holocaust Centre honours volunteers

Government grant announced

Holocaust survivors who serve as speakers and docents (tour leaders) for the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto share their stories with 20,000 students and teachers each year. Recently, they shared with each other instead.

The 18th annual Survivors and Docents Educational Enrichment Day was not only an opportunity to give the volunteers tools they can use in their work, it was a chance for them to get together as a group.

"I see Israel, Afghanistan, Iran, Syria, Iraq, Gaza, Darfur, terrorism – they all seem to be the fault of the Jews and the Jewish State," said Lorraine Sandler, chair of the Holocaust Centre. "How come the adult world still believes in fairy tales? You are all our best antidote. You teach children to question evil and intolerable action," she told the volunteers on hand.

Alex Levin, a survivor speaker to mostly non-Jewish students, explained his involvement. "My mother was killed, my father was killed, and my five-year-old brother was killed. They cannot speak. I must speak." Levin was joined by Yona Bromberg, a survivor looking to join the centre's speakers bureau because she now feels, 60 years after the Shoah, that "it's getting easier" to talk about her experiences.

Rabbi Joe Kanofsky, director of education for the Holocaust Centre, who lived in Poland in the early 1990s and the beginning of this century, told participants, "Jewish life in Central Europe is not flourishing, but it's certainly happening," he said, describing new yeshivot in Poland, Jewish pre-schools in Germany, and a Jewish camp in Hungary.

Lorraine Sandler, chair of the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, shares a smile with Mike Colle, Ontario minister of citizenship and immigration, at the recently held Docent Day. During the event, Minister Colle announced a $12,000 government contribution to the Holocaust Centre's annual creative writing and arts contest.

"The Hitlers of the world come and go and cause a lot of damage but what they forget is that they condemn themselves to living forever only in our memory. The Jewish people are always here."

During the event, Ontario Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Mike Colle announced a $12,000 government contribution to the Holocaust Centre's annual creative writing and arts contest which is designed to encourage Ontario's Jewish and non-Jewish students to think about the issues of hate, intolerance and anti-semitism.

Colle explained the government's commitment to the Holocaust Centre and its programming: "If you're truly touched by the atrocities, you have to do something to make sure it doesn't happen again."

The voice of UJA Federation steps down after 27 years

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Just over 27 years ago, Sara Mosoff, then a self-described "57-year-old Jewish housewife with nothing much to do," realized that she needed a copy of a receipt she had misplaced for her donation to that year's UJA Federation annual campaign. That receipt would change Sara's life forever and the lives of so many she has touched since then.

After arriving at the UJA Federation offices - then on Beverley Street in downtown Toronto - Mosoff, who was known around the place thanks to her voluntarism with Women's Campaign, was asked if she would be interested in becoming a full-time employee.

While the job offer was tempting, the avid golfer accepted with one condition.

"I told them I'd work winters, but the summers, well, that was for playing golf," said Mosoff. "It worked that way for a few years anyway, but, as the demands of my job grew – mostly because Toronto's Jewish community was growing in leaps and bounds - I needed to work full-time."

After her stint with Women's Campaign, Mosoff became the voice of UJA Federation, working in Donor Services where she answered countless calls from community members.

Sara Mosoff

Now, almost three decades later, the 84-year-old mother of two and bubbie of four, is calling it quits, figuring it's time for a change; a time to spend with her kids and grandkids. Mosoff stepped down at the end of September.

"Sara's dedication and commitment to UJA Federation over the last 27 years are almost impossible to measure," said Carol Kassel, UJA Federation's senior vice president, integrated development. "Her pleasant, caring voice on the phone has soothed many an irate donor and her smiling face at our front door makes everyone feel welcome and special. On a personal note, I have enjoyed working with Sara since her Women's Campaign days and I will miss her very much."

"Sara has always been a positive influence on me and the work we do," said UJA Federation campaign director, Jeff Springer. "Her commitment to our community is exemplary. I will miss her a great deal."

"Leaving UJA Federation is somewhat bittersweet," Mosoff said. "I've made lifelong friends and I've seen babies grow into wonderful adults. I've quite literally seen Jewish Toronto grow from childhood and adolescence to adulthood. I wouldn't have changed it for the world."

"Sara is the UJA Federation office mom," said Livana Ohayon, who has worked with Sara for 25 years. "Most importantly, Sara loved what she did here. I don't think I have known anyone here who cares about what they do the way she did. Sara did her job with all her heart because it was so important to her that we help the Jewish community here and, of course, our homeland, Israel."

Ina Glick, who has been at UJA Federation for 31 years, is sad to see Mosoff go, but has fond memories of her long-time co-worker.

"I remember that when Sara started here, one of her primary jobs was to enter each and every donation to the campaign in a ledger book by hand," said Glick. "Now, of course, with technology, all that has changed, but Sara never did. She was always committed to the Jewish cause, always passionate about her role here."

"Working alongside Sara in Donor Services over the past 11 years has been one incredible trip," said Michelle Spring. "She is an incredible friend and mentor to me and I value all she has taught me. She will be sorely missed by all of us."

"Probably the most fulfilling part of my years at UJA Federation is seeing how Toronto has swelled with vibrant new Jewish life. I would be willing to wager that Toronto's Jewish community is one of the strongest anywhere in the Diaspora. I am so proud of the growth of our Jewish community, and, with it, the growth of UJA Federation," noted Mosoff.

Suddenly, the youthful and energetic octogenarian leapt to her feet, cutting our interview short.

"Sorry, Dan," she said, "but I've got to go. We have some big cheques waiting upstairs, and you know nothing makes me happier than that."

Renewal underway in northern Israel

Psychological and economic scars are still deeply felt

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

With funding from North American Jewish Federations, northern Israel work crews are labouring around the clock to repair buildings damaged by Hezbollah rockets and the results are beginning to show. The outer face of Israel's north is improving, but the psychological and economic damage to Israeli residents is still severe.

Israel's Industry and Trade Ministry estimated, at the end of August, that a quarter of northern Israel businesses may be forced to close.

A recent UJA Federation mission to northern Israel not only found lingering anguish from the incessant rocket attacks but enormous resilience as well.

"We saw the impact and devastation that 4,000 katyusha rockets made on physical structures in each town and on the magnificent landscape of the Galil, leaving the green, lush environment burned and blackened," said Wendy Eisen who, along with her husband Elliott, chaired the mission. "More importantly, we saw the resilience of the people, who, after 30 days of cramped living in underground shelters, are going about the business of living normally, with smiles on their faces and with the greatest appreciation for the partnership of Jews, worldwide, who have assured them that in their hour of need, they are not alone."

Repairs are well underway in northern Israel following the month-long war with Hezbollah.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is relieving the anxiety, distress, and hardship felt by thousands of northern Israel residents through Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, now underway.

Campaign gifts are being allocated to among other initiatives:

- Recovery from war-time trauma, especially for school children and new immigrants
- Small business loans for those whose livelihoods were lost during the war
- Scholarships for college students who could not work to earn their tuitions during the summer
- The restoration of home care, meals on wheels and other services for the elderly
- Temporary housing while destroyed homes that are still damaged wait to be rebuilt.

Dozens of Web site blogs illustrate the dimension of Israel's emergency recovery. Many of them, written by immigrants from the former Soviet Union, living in the north, have been brought to light by the Jewish Agency for Israel, UJA Federation's overseas partner.

"Today I was very lucky - the missile fell 50 meters from our house, on to the roof of the nearby industrial building. We were ok, except frightened (me especially) and our windows have holes now," wrote Jimmka from Kiryat Bialik on August 5.

"I lost count which day of war it is. For the last three weeks my family is not at home, and I am carrying all my belongings on myself at all times, like a snail, because it's a rare morning when I know where I will spend the next night. Actually, usually it's the hospital - whether I am on duty or not. My family is already beyond despair, but there is no choice - getting back home now would be a stupid move," added a blogger calling herself Olgabrook the next night.

The UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 total now exceeds $55 million with over $17 million designated for Israel's emergency needs.

To make a campaign contribution, visit www.ujadonations.com or call the campaign hotline at 416.631.5705.

In His Words

Herzl's historic will fulfilled

Recently, Zeev Bielski, who chairs both the World Zionist Organization and the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel (UJA Federation's overseas partner), led a delegation to France to bring the remains of Theodore Herzl's son and daughter to Israel. Paulina and Hans Herzl died in September 1930 and were buried in Bordeaux. The will of their father - Theodore (Benjamin Zeev) –founder of the modern Zionist movement - expressed his wish for the children to be buried beside him on Mt. Herzl in Israel, where he was laid to rest in 1949. Here are Zeev Bielski's edited thoughts one day after the moving reburial ceremony that took place on September 20, before Rosh Hashana.

As I write to you, I am filled with such intense emotion for the great privilege bestowed upon us to work alongside the Prime Minister, Ehud Olmert, to fulfill a historical justice and bring Herzl's children for burial in Israel. Yesterday, the State of Israel and the Zionist movement paid their debt to Benjamin Zeev Herzl, Israel's state visionary, coming full circle 70 years after the death of Hans and Paulina Herzl and their internment in the Jewish cemetery in Bordeaux.

For me, as Chairman of the World Zionist Organization - the same institution envisioned, founded and first chaired by Herzl - it is a dual honor to carry out the will of a man who's vision, spirit, and resolute Zionist stance culminated in the ultimate contribution of a national initiative to build a sovereign state for the Jewish People in the land of Israel.

We escorted the caskets from Bordeaux to Paris and on to our final destination, Mt. Herzl in Jerusalem, for internment at the side of their father, Benjamin Zeev Herzl.

Yesterday we closed a chapter in history. Yesterday, we completed an act of justice for Judaism, for history and for Zionism. Above all is the personal and humane justice paid to Benjamin Zeev Herzl, Israel's State visionary.

It is appropriate to remind us all that Benjamin Zeev Herzl's vision of a Jewish State, exemplified by an exceptional ethical society, is no less applicable today than it was a century ago. If I may be so bold, I assert that it is perhaps even more relevant and important now than ever before. Though numerous are the remarkable achievements of the State of Israel in all areas of society, the challenge of creating an exemplary society is a dynamic task leveraged by the changing reality of the world we live in today.

On this important day, we are reminded of our commitment to bestow upon the next generation, our sons and daughters, the Jewish values, humanitarianism and Zionism expressed by the State visionary. At this time, at the end of a difficult and painful war, at a time of national reflection…this is the most important mission we have placed before ourselves – to expand and deepen our connection to the fundamental values that constitute our nation, to gather strength and faith from them and, in sum, we must solidify them as foundations, firmly set in our lives in the State of Israel.

The caskets containing the remains of Hans and Paulina Herzl, the children of Benjamin Zeev Herzl, were recently flown from a cemetery in Bordeaux, France to Jerusalem for internment at the side of their father, on Mt. Herzl. (inset) Zeev Bielski, chairman of JAFI, speaks at the reburial ceremony.

On this day we remember our dedication to the vision of Herzl – to encourage aliyah among members of the Jewish People from the four corners of the globe and to expand the Jewish education of the younger generation around the world. On the eve of this New Year, I praise the completion of this important historical process of bringing Paulina and Hans Herzl for burial in the State of Israel. At this time it is fitting to remember the youngest child of Herzl, his daughter, Trude, who perished in the Holocaust and whose final resting place remains forever unknown.

Blessed be their eternal memory.

May this be a blessed year for the Jewish People and the State of Israel.

UJA solidarity mission tours northern Israel

Fourteen participants on the recent UJA Federation solidarity mission to northern Israel take a moment to pose for this photo at an Israel Defense Forces (IDF) artillery unit on the Golan Heights. The mission – chaired by Wendy & Elliott Eisen – took participants to a number of northern communities devastated by the 34 day war with Hezbollah, including Haifa, Nahariya, Metulla, Kiryat Shmona and Kibbutz Misgav Am, a northern community that overlooks Lebanon. Harbord Club to honour husband-wife medical team

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Former students and teachers of Harbord Collegiate Institute and former patients of doctors Gerry and May Cohen are being invited to honour a husband-and-wife team who have left an indelible mark on the Canadian medical community.

The Harbord Club will honour the Cohens at a dinner on Oct. 19 at the Meron Banquet Hall in Vaughan.

May and Gerry graduated from Harbord in 1949 as gold and silver medalists, respectively. They went on to excel at the University of Toronto's medical school. Graduating in 1955, they attained numerous honours for academic excellence.

In 1977, they left their successful family practice in Bathurst Manor when they were recruited by McMaster University's faculty of health sciences to teach and practise family medicine.

Gerry became an educational leader in the undergraduate medical program, as well as director of a teaching community health centre.

May was appointed associate dean of health sciences. She earned national and international recognition for her work in women's health and in advancing the careers of female physicians. She received a number of awards, including the Governor General's Award in 1995.

May and Gerry retired from McMaster as professors emeriti in 1998 and returned to Toronto, where they continue their involvement in health care on a part-time basis.

Murray Rubin, a retired pharmacist who graduated from Harbord in 1950, has been involved in many projects at the Harbord Club, which was was established to maintain a sense of common identity among former students and teachers. It has 1,700 members from among the alumni of Harbord, which was a hub of Jewish life in Toronto until the end of the 1950s.

Doctors Gerry and May Cohen

He said the club regularly honours former Harbord students who have achieved success in their respective fields, and funds raised from the dinner and a silent auction will go to support Harbord Club projects, such as scholarships.

"We are delighted to have May and Gerry as our 2006 honorees," Rubin said. "They bring great pride to Harbord Collegiate, their profession and to Canadian society."

Ticket are $50 for the dinner, which offers a choice of menus, including glatt kosher and vegetarian.

For tickets, call Murray Rubin at 416-483-0985, or send a cheque, payable to the Harbord Club, to 286 Harbord St., Toronto, Ont., M6G 1G5.

Woman of Valour luncheon planned

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center of Holocaust Studies' inaugural Woman of Valour Luncheon is honouring three women actively involved in the organization.

The sold-out luncheon, taking place Oct. 11, is paying tribute to Carole Grafstein, Elise Kalles and Pauline Menkes. Luncheon keynote speaker is Bonnie Fuller, executive vice-president and chief editorial director of American Media, Inc.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center, headquartered in Los Angeles, is an international Jewish human rights organization whose mission is to generate change by confronting anti-Semitism, hate and terrorism, promoting human rights and dignity, standing with Israel, defending the safety of Jews worldwide and teaching the lessons of the Holocaust for future generations.

Programs and services provided by the centre include the Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles and the New York Tolerance Center, the only training facility of its kind for professional training and youth education.

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal, says the idea behind the first annual luncheon is to bring in women so they can participate in the organization and become leaders.

"The premise is that there are many accomplished women, and we want them involved. Not only have the honorees volunteered in our community, they have also been supportive of the organization. We want to acknowledge them and say thank you."

Carol Grafstein, married to Senator Jerry Grafstein, is involved in a number of other organizations including Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest, Israel Cancer Research Fund and the Lion of Judah, Women's Alliance of UJA Federation.

Elise Kalles, a real estate broker, also supports Israel Cancer Research Fund and the Lion of Judah, Women's Alliance of UJA Federation.

Pauline Menkes, a native of New York, is also involved in UJA Federation, Weizmann Institute of Science, Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, the Israel Museum, Toronto General Hospital, and Princess Margaret and Mount Sinai hospitals.

Luncheon co-chairs are Anna Koffler and Helene Korn, and committee chair is Barb Silverberg.

Leo Baeck on path to International Baccalaureate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Leo Baeck Day School has been accepted as a prospective member of the International Baccalaureate Organization (IBO) for its middle years program.

Only two other Jewish day schools, one in Mexico and one in the United States, are members of the prestigious organization, which works with 1,888 schools in 124 countries, including about two dozen public and private schools in the Toronto area, to improve their curricula and teaching methods.

The IBO offers three programs: one for students age 3 to 12 (the primary years program); another for age 11 to 16 (the middle years program); and its oldest and best-known program, a diploma program for students age 16 to 19, which dates back to 1968.

The middle years program at Leo Baeck will run from Grade 6 to Grade 8, the highest grade the school offers. The school will develop its own version of the program for younger students, said David Prashker, the school's director.

He said the prospective membership for the middle years program, which was approved in June, is "extremely exciting." The program, for which he expects full qualification to take at least three years, aims to help students become critical thinkers and inquiring learners who care about local and world issues.

"It's a huge undertaking, especially for two campuses and 90 staff," Prashker said.

However, he noted, he doesn't believe it is a difficult change for teachers to make. "It's not as if you're asking a science teacher to teach French.

"It's not more work; it's different work. You plan differently. It takes more time to plan collaboratively… but it balances out."

The Leo Baeck initiative, which got underway last year with a school-wide pilot project, was proposed by Prashker's predecessor Zita Gardner before her retirement two years ago, Prashker said.

Last year, Leo Baeck implemented a school-wide project in which each teacher at both the Thornhill and the Toronto campuses used IBO methodology for a six-week "unit."

One aspect was incorporating an "attitude of the month" into the curriculum. "Junior kindergarten kids were using the word 'empathy' and really understood what it meant," said Prashker.

Also, teachers were asked to plan the work for the unit they chose in conjunction with at least one other subject teacher. Using a hypothetical example, Prashker noted that middle school students study astronomy as part of the science curriculum, while their Hebrew studies include the Book of Joshua, which is "full of astrology."

Response from teachers, parents, students and administrators has been overwhelmingly positive, Prashker said.

In May, the board gave the go-ahead to start the process of becoming an IBO school.

"This seemed like a great idea to enhance the way we teach," said Brian Simon, president of Leo Baeck's board. "We keep trying to improve how the kids learn."

Prashker said the change is not expected to be reflected in tuition fees, although there is a cost to join the IBO and also to implement related professional development. The school's professional development budget, set in 2005, "will be sufficient to meet our needs," said Prashker.

The school does not face any challenges specific to being a Jewish day school, nor does Prashker anticipate any substantive curriculum changes, he said. In fact, elements of the program, like having a second language, are already in place.

Sandra Coyle, an IBO spokesperson in New York, said the school's double curriculum would "mesh quite well" with the IBO program because of the IBO's commitment to "expanding knowledge beyond the regular" program that is offered at non-IBO schools.

More than a third of the teachers at Leo Baeck have already visited other IBO-affiliated schools or attended IBO workshops, or both, Prashker said.

"We're trying to learn as much as we can."

New CHAT principal makes daily class visits

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Frieda Woznica believes that the classroom is where the most important things happen in a school.

That's why the 580 students at the Richmond Hill campus of TanenbaumCHAT (or the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, as CHAT is now known) are getting used to seeing their new principal stopping into their classrooms for brief visits.

"I do classroom visits every day," Woznica said in an interview last week. "I hope that by my presence the students and teachers will realize how important [the classroom] is to me."

An early retiree from the Toronto District School Board, where she began her career some 30 years ago and most recently served as vice-principal of East York Collegiate Institute, Woznica, 53, always wanted to be a teacher.

Her father, the late Rabbi Israel Levin, was a congregational rabbi and a Hebrew teacher. Her late aunt was also a Hebrew teacher, and Woznica's sister is a former teacher.

A native of South Africa, Woznica immigrated with her family at age 8 and moved around Ontario, living in Timmins, Oakville and Belleville, then in Glace Bay, N.S., and Welland, Ont., before moving to Toronto in Grade 11.

After completing high school at Sir Sanford Fleming Secondary School, she studied at the University of Toronto, obtaining a BA in English and psychology, and then her B.Ed.

Coincidentally, her mandatory "out of town" placement as a student teacher was at Richmond Hill High School, in the same building now occupied by TanenbaumCHAT.

Frieda Woznica

Now the mother of three grown sons, all of whom are CHAT graduates, Woznica honed her considerable time-management skills by balancing an observant lifestyle with work in a secular environment. It was not unusual for her to arrive home minutes before candlelighting time on a winter Shabbat night, or to host a seder for up to 20 people on the first night of Passover after working until 3 or 3:30 p.m. the same day.

Having a supportive husband and the ability to get by on few hours of sleep, as well as being "highly motivated and excited about what I do," keeps her going, she said.

When her children were young, she taught part time, and in recent years, she has been working on her PhD at U of T's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. Her thesis will focus on the little-studied role of emotional intelligence in teachers and administrators.

"Even if teachers believe they are caring, and even if they are caring, if they're not projecting the caring to the students, it's going to impact on learning in a negative way," she said. "I think the teacher-student relationship is key to learning."

This year, working at a Jewish school for the first time, her professional and personal lives are merging. "It's really very nice," she said.

Woznica, who replaced Gary Levine (now director of professional services, Jewish studies, for both campuses), is excited about being part of the transition to the school's new building next September at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

As a former arts school vice-principal, she is particularly enthused about the state-of-the-art music system planned for TanenbaumCHAT's new location. "We're hoping to attract serious music students," she said.

And having recently attended her first school Shabbaton, Woznica was struck by the way older students looked out for their younger counterparts, and by the existence of both a traditional and an egalitarian minyan at the event.

"The 'C' in CHAT is for 'community,' so it's definitely an important goal of the school that every student no matter where on the religious spectrum they are, feels comfortable," she said.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For Sheri Oz, it was a seamless transition to move from teaching biology and agriculture in Israel to running a treatment centre for sex trauma survivors.

Oz, 55, a biology and agriculture major in university, says she moved to Israel 30 years ago because "she wanted to help make the desert green."

At her first job, in a boarding school, however, "teaching biology meant I also taught 'sex ed,' and that is when I discovered [what I really wanted to do.]"

A native of Toronto, she returned to Canada to study family therapy at University of Guelph, and then moved back to Israel where she developed an expertise in sexual abuse.

"I actually learned myself. That was in the '80s, and there were no courses. All experts in the field got educated by teaching each other and sharing knowledge."

Oz, a divorced mother of two grown daughters, said among the issues she studied were how sexual abuse victims are handled by society, the services available to help them, and what happens to victims' families.

She opened a clinic, Machon Eitan, in Kiryat Motzkin, north of Haifa, in 1999, she says, "because I wanted to work with the entire family under one roof. It was the first of its kind in Israel."

In Toronto recently to raise funds for the clinic, Oz, co-author of the new book Overcoming Childhood Sexual Trauma (Howarth Press) says she now has two family therapists, an art therapist, a drama therapist, a clinical social worker and a social psychologist working for her.

They offer therapy for children, adolescents and adults who were sexually traumatized; family and couples therapy for parents, spouses and other family members of sex trauma survivors; therapy for children, teens and adults who have sexually abused a child; and lectures, workshops and courses for professionals.

Sheri Oz

As well, they provide family assessments when there is a suspicion of sexual abuse.

One of the projects for which she is raising funds is a hotline for people afraid they're about to abuse a child, a drop-in centre for adults who have been abused, and a program for families in which a brother has abused a sister.

"[The latter] is particularly heartbreaking for families. They are poorly understood, and some say even the courts have been judgmental. They are tragic cases."

She says, however, that she tries not to report cases to the authorities. "I use the possibility of reporting to motivate families to seek therapy."

Her measure of success, says Oz, is to observe how abuse victims go about their everyday lives. "If I see an adult survivor functioning and developing a greater capacity for intimate relationships, then I know the therapy is working.

"Most child abuse victims have difficulty with social interactions and with expressing their feelings. If their parents see them making friends and co-operating in school and at home, then there has been success."

She says it was hard for her to leave Israel to come to Toronto, "especially after what went on all summer. I feel like I'm cut off when I'm here, but I'm exhausted from the stress."

Though her clinic was closed during the war, she says, she kept up with her clients by phone. "When they heard that I was in a traumatic state, it made them feel more normal. It was reassuring to them that their feelings were [justified.] Watching myself go in and gradually out of a stressful state gave me a lot of respect for the psychological process."

Some examples of common symptoms of trauma (not only sexual trauma), she says are low self-esteem, sleep problems, addictions, chronic headaches, relationship problems, difficulties concentrating, overwhelming fears and panic attacks, and nightmares.

"One client said that by observing me, she understood what she wanted to come out of and another said that I made her feel more hopeful. Everyone took it to their own place."

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Steve Braunstein of Buffalo, N.Y, the international president of the Alpha Omega dental fraternity, was in town recently to address members of the group's Toronto Alumni Chapter at its annual dinner.

Steve Braunstein

Founded in Baltimore in 1907 by a group of Jewish dental students to fight anti-Semitism in dental schools, Alpha Omega, with its headquarters now in Princeton Junction, N.J., is today primarily an educational and philanthropic organization. It has chapters and members in cities and dental schools in the United States, Canada, South America, Europe, Israel, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand.

The fraternity, which has has about 6,000 member dentists worldwide, will celebrate its 100th anniversary in 2007, and Braunstein told The CJN that "excitement for Alpha Omega's centennial year is building."

He said there are plans for a travelling centennial exhibit and for a permanent exhibit in Jerusalem to be completed by the end of 2007.

The kickoff to the year-long celebration will take place in Las Vegas at the group's convention in December.

While in Toronto, Braunstein – accompanied by Alpha Omega international director Terry Shapero, Toronto chapter president Barry Reinblatt and David Mock, dean of the University of Toronto's dental school – met with members of the fraternity's student chapter at U of T.

Reinblatt said the Toronto Alumni chapter "will have a full schedule of social and continuing education programs in conjunction with our many philanthropic pursuits."

He noted that the chapter supports "many local and Israeli charities, and we have a wide range of continuing education and social programs for our members."

We are commanded to be happy!

By RABBI LORI COHEN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

"V'samachta b'chagecha!" – "You shall rejoice in your festival." What a mitzvah to have to follow! We are actually commanded to be happy.

The Torah commands us to appear before the Lord for three festivals a year – Pesach, Shavuot and Sukkot. In biblical times, there were specific rituals that were performed and sacrifices that were offered for each holiday, but that was not sufficient. Especially during Sukkot, we are commanded to elevate both our physical selves and our spiritual selves. We are to follow the details of our obligations to God, but we are also to clothe ourselves in festive clothing and to enjoy the earthly pleasures of food and drink.

In the Talmud, we read that "the soul becomes truly joyous only if the body too co-operates; therefore, it is necessary to gladden the body with good food and drink and clothing to achieve that true and proper harmony of pleasure which is expected of us on our festivals".

However, the mitzvah continues by stating that we are to celebrate with our families, our slaves, the strangers, the orphans and the widows. In other words, we are to invite to our holy day celebrations all of the people in society who have less reason to be happy due to unfortunate circumstances.

This leads to an interesting philosophical question – is it possible to be happy by ourselves, or is it only through making others happy that we can truly rejoice?

The sukkah, the fragile dwelling that we inhabit during Sukkot, is traditionally a place to invite guests. Many people decorate their sukkah with pictures of biblical characters to "invite" them to participate in their festivities. This is to fulfil the mitzvah of "ushpizin" – inviting guests into our sukkah.

But I believe we must go beyond the pictures. We are literally commanded to invite those who do not have the opportunity to celebrate the holiday in a festive way. Many people in our society need a chance to laugh and find joy, if only for an evening, and it is our responsibility to make that happen.

A popular Hebrew folksong actually combines the words from two Torah verses: "V'samachta b'chagecha v'hayita ach sameach" – Rejoice in your festival and then you will be truly happy. Thus, only when we have fulfilled all of the mitzvot for the festival will we be truly happy. So open your home or your sukkah, make it a place of joy and laughter and help elevate another soul with your own.

Chag Samayach.

The more things change…

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

The holiday of Sukkot is somewhat familiar to most Jews. We know about building the sukkah, taking the lulav and etrog in hand for blessing, and discussing the weather to decide if this year it will be comfortable to sit in the sukkah for long meals or quick ones. We gather the branches to put on top of the sukkah, and in the past few years, we have had a proliferation of pre-fab, ready-to-build sukkot in plastic, fabric, metal, wood or bamboo that seem to be popping up at every storefront or parking lot.

It's wonderful to see the flurry of activity and surround ourselves with the smell of citrus and fruit and decorations. What we no longer have expression of is the ancient water libation that was once a significant part of the Sukkot celebration.

During the Temple era, at the end of the first day of Sukkot, everyone would gather in the Women's Court of the Temple for an elaborate water libation celebration during which water was drawn and poured on the altar. The Talmud tells us clearly that people who have not seen the rejoicing at the place of the water-drawing have never seen true rejoicing in their lifetime – a tremendously powerful statement on joy, a true simchah.

In fact, the symbolic echoes of the water-drawing ceremony and the messianic era of drawing from the wellsprings of redemption dialogue with each other in visions of a new era where joy and true simchah will frame reality. When viewed in that light, losing the water libation celebration is not a small thing.

The Talmud also outlines an elaborate processional of priests, Levites and Israelites as they weave through the Temple, lighting lights, singing songs, playing instruments and preparing for the pouring of the water libation itself. The technicalities are enormous, the ritual itself is of utmost importance and all of Israel is gathered together to experience the greatest national expression of joy that will occur that year.

Amidst all the texts that describe this tremendously powerful and heightened expression of happiness, there is the reality of the Jewish people at the time of the Temple.

Two thousand years ago, we were an extremely factionalized nation. There were many distinct groups who could not agree on how to fulfil the technicalities of the commandments or what the philosophy of Judaism should be. They debated whether or not there really was an eternal soul and whether ritual should be adhered to with strictness or with lenience.

The evidence from our texts describes a nation that disagreed and debated everything. When the arguments weakened the structure of the people, when the doors to the enemy began to open because of the disputes, the sages of ancient Israel warned all future generations to take heed.

There must have been fierce and heated debate over the complex technicalities involved in the water libation – processionals, candles, singing, drawing water, pouring water. Yet interestingly, the texts reflect the joy of the unity of Israel at those moments.

We are told in the Talmud that once the celebration was concluded, "When they separated one from the other, what did they say to one another? 'The Lord bless you from Zion and you should see the good of Jerusalem all the days of your life and see your children's children. Peace be on Israel.'"

With a combined population of more than 1,400 students, The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) is the largest Jewish high school outside Israel.

CHAT students have gone on to excel in many areas. The school is a training ground for leaders in the Jewish community at a time when our community is encountering increasing animosity and needs to prepare itself to confront a more hostile world. It gives students a chance to define their Jewish identity and be prepared to defend it. As one who has taught at the school for the past 34 years, I am particularly proud of those former students who have come back to CHAT as teachers.

Past Forward

Many of us have taken strange routes to arrive at the school. Rabbi Philip Scheim of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue asked me awhile ago how I got to CHAT. As the only Jew in my public elementary school, I resented my parents' forcing me to go to Jewish school in the afternoon while my friends stayed home, played and watched TV. Consequently, I swore after my bar mitzvah that I would never set foot inside a Jewish school again. Not in my wildest dreams did I ever imagine that I would not only set foot in a Jewish school, but that I would be there teaching for over three decades.

Fate has strange things in store for us. At least that was my take on it when I told Rabbi Scheim the story. His interpretation was different from mine. He began to laugh when I told him the tale. Puzzled, I asked why. Because, he said, "you see, Alex, God has a sense of humour."

Prior to my arrival at CHAT, I became aware of my Jewish identity through the study of history and archeology, although I first became fascinated with our people's past and its archeological remains when I lived in Israel as a young boy. This fascination has remained with me ever since. I indulged it even further while studying in university. For 25 years, I was fortunate to have taught archeologically related courses at the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies. In conjunction with these courses, I took my students to participate in some major excavations such as the City of David in Jerusalem.

Always in the back of my mind was the thought that participating in archeological excavations in Israel would be the ideal way to inculcate key values and skills in our students at CHAT. An excavation would give them first-hand appreciation of our history as well as instilling in them a love of Israel and its past. It would help them define their Jewish identity in a tangible way. It would also hone methodological and problem-solving skills so important for success in today's world.

Fortunately CHAT has been presented with such an opportunity. In my capacity as president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at St. Michael's College at U of T, I recently helped organize an international conference on the Sea Peoples, the best-known being the biblical Philistines. One of the speakers was Ayelet Gilboa, co-director of the excavations at Tel Dor in Israel, who invited us to help excavate her site with the blessing of Cobie Brosh, the Israeli consul general in Toronto.

Dor is a major Mediterranean site whose excavations are casting light on the relationships between the eastern Mediterranean and the West. It is a visually breathtaking site on a turquoise lagoon halfway between Tel Aviv and Haifa. Tel Dor had a prominent biblical history, but it was then occupied by the major powers of the ancient world, including Assyrians, Phoenicians, Persians, Greeks and Romans, making it an ideal site for students studying ancient history.

Excavating Dor will give CHAT students a unique chance to immerse themselves in our heritage and become a part of it. It will also be a voyage of self-discovery. There is no better way to commit to our future than to appreciate our past. Past – Forward.

If you're putting up a sukkah this year or perhaps visiting a friend's – be prepared to be joined by some other esteemed guests: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron and King David. Those seven tzaddikim (righteous people) are traditionally welcomed into the sukkah during the seven days of Sukkot. Today, a look at the ushpizin. [http://tinyurl.com/fl4zy]

The Jewish Highway

The mystical book, the Zohar, is the source of ushpizin ("guests" in Aramaic.) It explains that "when a person sits in his sukkah, the Shchinah (God's Divine Presence) spreads its wings over it from above and then Abraham together with the other five tzaddikim and King David dwell together with him." Abraham is the guest on the first day, Isaac on the second and so on. [http://tinyurl.com/fqk2s]

"Each of these ancient personalities represented a particular spiritual blessing, characteristic or mystical aspect of God (sfirah). These figures were imagined to dine with their hosts, bringing their unique qualities into the sacred space of the sukkah." [http://tinyurl.com/gxqwh]

But merely dining with a heavenly guest is not good enough. The 19th-century Rebbe of Sanz warned that these holy visitors would undoubtedly refuse to dwell in a sukkah where the poor were not also welcome. [http://tinyurl.com/zzq2r] Virtual Jerusalem explains that there is a custom "to invite seven poor people to eat in the sukkah corresponding to the seven ushpizin. You then have seven exalted guests from above, with seven earthly guests and God's Divine Presence hovering over it all." [http://tinyurl.com/fqk2s]

In addition to the traditional ushpizin, several other variations have ushered in more modern guests. For example, the sixth Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn (1880-1950), spoke of seven "chassidic ushpizin" as well: the Baal Shem Tov, the Maggid (Rabbi DovBer of Mezeritch) and the first five rebbes of Chabad. [http://tinyurl.com/z46la]

Even more recently, female guests were welcomed into the sukkah. The ushpizot guide created by the Ma'yan Jewish Women's Project quotes a medieval kabbalist who said that along with the seven male guests, we should invite the seven female prophets listed in the Talmud: Sarah, Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, Avigail, Huldah and Esther. The site has brief biographies of these personalities as well as recommended activities for an ushpizot celebration. [http://tinyurl.com/gxqwh]

Unless you have a great imagination, it can be a challenge believing these great people really are in your midst. Barbara Weill has a suggestion: hold a press conference. In one of her role-playing games, you invite several friends to your sukkah and have each adopt the identity of one of the traditional ushpizin. Each real-life ushpiz is asked "questions concerning his life as related in the Bible. For example, one might ask Abraham, 'How could you agree to offer up your son Isaac as a sacrifice?'" Players are scored for the quality of their questions and responses. [http://tinyurl.com/hztxr]

Although not a common word, ushpizin entered a wider lexicon after the release of the award-winning movie of the same name. Ushpizin (2004) tells the tale of a devout, childless couple who welcome two unconventional guests to their sukkah. [http://tinyurl.com/89pnk] You can watch the movie's trailer at the film's website. [www.ushpizin.com/]

Finally, a poignant story of a very personal ushpizin. Several years ago, Timora (Timmi) Avitzour died of leukemia at the age of 18. Her mother's blog has memoirs about her daughter's six-year struggle and its aftermath. [http://tinyurl.com/fcxlb] She tells of sitting in the sukkah almost five years after Timmi's death when another of her daughters "surprised us by saying with a smile, 'Maybe tomorrow Timmi will come and be our guest in the sukkah. It will be her birthday, after all.'... I think that at that moment all of us at the table felt bound to each other in a mixture of contradictory feelings – a warm happiness at our memories of Timmi, a deep sadness that she will never again sing with us and an intense yearning for the possibility that, in honour of her birthday, she might actually make this Sukkot 'our time of joy' by joining the Patriarch Isaac the next evening as one of the ushpizin at our table.

Loan proposal means 'debt for life': parent

But Yossi Adler, a parent who has been active in lobbying for provincial funding for religious schools, maintains that "if there's no funding, there will be no quality."

He said he was disappointed with the report, criticizing both its summary's lack of specifics and the fact that the people most involved in lobbying for government funding were not consulted.

Ira Walfish, a former co-president of the Ontario Association for Jewish Day Schools, said the OAJDS has worked on the issue for more than five years, including presenting reports to the government. He believes the federation should be assisting in lobbying the province on the funding issue, but not "leading the charge."

Walfish said that the federation has an inherent conflict of interest and thus can't effectively criticize the government on tuition issues when it is providing other funds and services that the federation wants.

OAJDS is still extremely active in trying to get government funding, said Aaron Blumenfeld, Walfish's former co-chair. The federation is "100 per cent" reinventing the wheel in terms of lobbying for funding, he said.

Adler said he knows a number of people who have removed their children from day schools because they "can't afford it, or are not willing to humiliate themselves" by going through the tuition-subsidy application process. He said parents are resorting to taking out loans, because finances are tight when annual tuition for a family with three children is about $35,000 per year.

Jerrold Landau, a software developer with three children in day schools and one who has not yet started school, was particularly critical of the federation's loan proposal. "All that's going to do is ensure that parents are behind the eight-ball for life. It's going to put them into debt for life."

Epstein said he didn't think the loan program "in itself" is enough. "The recommendations that have to do with funding are recommendations that together would help."

The possibility of a loan program was also investigated about six or seven years ago, Epstein added, but at the time it "didn't seem feasible."

If government funding became a reality, as in other provinces, tuitions would be "grossly reduced," he said.

Tuitions "cannot be lowered without some kind of support from the government," stressed federation spokesperson Howard English.

Eighty per cent of the cost of tuition goes to teacher salaries "and salaries are not going down anywhere soon," Engel noted.

The committee has looked at how to reduce other costs, such as having schools join forces to purchase items such as computers and utilities.

But it hasn't yet been determined how the $100-million endowment fund would be used, English said.

Part of the answer will become obvious when some people give money to the fund for specific purposes, Engel said.

But, he added, "hopefully we'll get as much unrestricted funds as possible."

Toronto Heschel School principal Gail Baker – who was otherwise positive about the report – said that, from a philosophical standpoint, a community middle school, such as the one proposed, would be a mistake. She believes that "a lot of research bears it out."

She said her own school would be "greatly" affected by a new community middle school. "We have a particular philosophy and way of teaching that follows from JK to Grade 8."

Baker – like other administrators and parents interviewed for this article – had not seen the report itself, only the online summary. The full report had not been posted on the federation website when The CJN went to press.

Mark Smiley, educational director of Associated Hebrew Schools – a three-campus "community" school, of which one campus is a middle school – said the proposed community middle school "may be the federation's plan to merge the middle schools of all the northern CHAT-feeding schools."

Although he said he is excited that "the community is trying to get its hands around the critical dilemmas that are facing the day schools" and "enhancing the accountability" of day schools, Smiley added that he's "perplexed" about the creation of a new school that would "not increase the number of students in the northern day schools.

"Also," he noted, "I did not see in the report any answer to or support of day schools with open-door policies that are currently receiving only 50 cents on the dollar to help with financially assisted students."

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said that, "in general, we're delighted to see that Jewish education, and particularly the day schools, are remaining the centre of UJA Federation's concerns. We particularly welcome the education endowment fund proposal."

Although Shaviv said that tuition assistance still remains "the major need for the foreseeable future," he noted that one area the report could have addressed was a tuition reduction for children of day school teachers. Also, he said, housing assistance for teachers is something that "private schools in major urban areas are increasingly" doing.

Winnipeg initiative helps local foster children

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Individualized handmade quilts are now being given to every foster child placed by Jewish Child and Family Services (JCFS) in the city.

"Many kids in foster care come to us with nothing," says Randee Pollock, adoption and foster care co-ordinator at JCFS. "The quilt-giving idea gives them something to start out with, something they can call their own."

The innovative program, called Cover Our Kids with Care, started with an idea from JCFS foster mother Debbie Pinsky and her sister Karen Hornby, who believed that having their own quilts might make the foster child experience easier for children of all ages.

JCFS currently has 16 foster children, Pollock says, and "each quilt is unique, for each individual child or youth in the program. There are babies, school age and adolescent kids – all with different personalities and tastes. Quilts are something very intimate and comforting for kids, something they take to their beds at night.

"One boy," Pollock adds, "wanted to take his quilt with him to school, but decided not to, so that he wouldn't lose the specialness of it."

Material, batting, thread and more are donated by fabric stores and manufacturers as far away as Montreal, Pollock says.

The quilters are also a very special group, says Merrill Shwaid, public relations co-ordinator at JCFS.

"The quilters really care about what they are doing for the kids," Shwaid says. "It takes them three hours just to pick out the material, pattern and design of the quilts. They are a tightknit group, unto themselves... passionate about this project, knowing the quilts are going to children – each stitch is made with love."

In addition, she says, the quilts show how the community has come together to work on this project. "Many people collaborate on making them – from those who have never sewn before to those who are expert quilters."

The project's quilters come from a group called the Manitoba Prairie Quilters Guild, Shwaid says. Some of the quilters who regularly work on the projects are Bev Binder, Karen Hornby, Cecile Montgomery, Yvonne Kok and Islay May Garroni, and they "share a tight bond."

togethers. All of the quilters have very busy day-to-day schedules already, yet they make time for this. It is a 'feel good' activity for kids who need and use the quilts. The quilts are special to the kids. It is a win-win project for everyone."

JCFS, Shwaid says, "encourages people to fund the quilting initiative, but also to support the foster children, making it possible for them to fully participate in extracurricular activities such as sport and summer camp, and Jewish milestones, like bar and bat mitzvahs."

A donation of $18 provides one square of a quilt. It costs about $1,000 to make an entire handmade quilt.

Dawson victim continues to improve

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Members of the Jewish community have been coming forward to express their solidarity with the family of Leslie Markofsky, the most gravely wounded of the 20 people injured in the Sept. 13 Dawson College shooting spree.

People who know him describe him as a friendly, highly intelligent young man, and an avid golfer with a very promising future.

Although the condition of Markofsky, 22, had reportedly stabilized and "continued to improve" last week, he remained in critical care and was the only Dawson victim still in hospital.

Markofsky continued to be treated at Montreal General Hospital's intensive care unit – according to news reports, he was in a medically induced coma – as physicians decided how to deal with a bullet lodged in his brain. Another bullet was removed from his brain soon after the shooting.

At Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard des Ormeaux, where his family lives, Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz said his shul has received scores of e-mails from all over the world as the result of a request he made Sept. 17 to hundreds of people on the shul's e-mail list to pray for Dawson victims, including Markofsky, and to send a refuah-shleimah on his behalf.

The Markofskys aren't members of Beth Tikvah, but Rabbi Zeitz serves as a chaplain at the Montreal General Hospital and has visited with the family there.

"It is a very private affair, and they want their privacy as any family would whose child is gravely injured," he told The CJN. "We need to use the power of prayer and hope to see success in the new year."

The Markofskys are members of Congregation Beth-El, whose spiritual leader, Rabbi Ronnie Cahana, has also paid a visit to the hospital.

A prize-winning business student now attending Concordia University, Markofsky happened to be at Dawson for an "icebreaker" pizza lunch with incoming business students when Kimveer Gill began his lunch- hour rampage. Gill killed himself after he was shot by police and his capture was imminent.

According to Robert Soroka, a Dawson business professor who has known Markofsky for several years and coached him on a student team that won an inaugural Business Development Bank of Canada competition for CEGEP business students last February, Markofsky was among the "top one per cent" of students he has come into contact with.

Also on the team was Markofsky's sister, Lauren, who graduated with her brother from Dawson last spring. But contrary to previous reports, she is 20 years old and not his twin.

In a team group photograph taken at the awards ceremony, Markofsky can be seen grinning from ear to ear, with his equally beaming sister only steps away.

"I don't remember ever seeing him without a smile on his face," Soroka told The CJN, citing Markofsky's school presentations as among the best he has seen.

Soroka was in his fourth-floor office when the shooting began, and he said that everyone "felt terrible" at the news that Markofsky was among those wounded.

Another acquaintance, former Montrealer Jordan Berson, 35, said he taught Markofsky chess when Markofsky was a boy at the Hebrew Foundation School (which is attached to Beth Tikvah), as well as at the Lakeshore Chess Club and Westpark Elementary School.

"I remember a very bright kid," said Berson, who now lives in St. John's, Nfld. "It was a real shock to hear what happened. As soon as I heard the name, I knew who it was."

Torah High enrolment exceeds expectations

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Ottawa chapter of National Council of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) recently launched its own version of Torah High, an after-school program for high school students.

Enthusiasm about the program was evident when students, parents and friends gathered for Torah High's opening barbecue on Sept. 17.

The program, which follows the success of a similar one in Toronto, aims to bring together Jewish teens, regardless of affiliation or level of Jewish education. Offering both credit and non-credit courses as well as a place for social interaction, Torah High is located in a strip mall within walking distance of Sir Robert Borden High School in the city's west end. Students from other schools travel there by taxi.

Classes are held in a room furnished with comfortable couches, a 52-inch flat-screen television, an Xbox, computers and a foosball table. To make the program accessible, tuition and transportation are free. It is funded by a grant from the Jewish Federation of Ottawa and private donations.

"We were motivated by the demographics showing a decline in involvement in the Jewish community of high school students and young adults," said Kathi Kovacs, chair of NCSY Ottawa.

"That was worrisome, and we felt that the ideal would be that all Jewish teens attend a Jewish high school but for many youth that just hasn't been an option. The community seemed to be ready for a change and seemed to be looking for new ideas and ventures."

Student teachers learn about the Holocaust

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — On an ordinary fall day recently at the University of British Columbia's Okanagan campus in Kelowna, 100 student teachers shuffled sleepily into their lecture hall for morning classes.

Only this day would be different as their lecturers were Vera Schiff, a Holocaust survivor, and Carson Phillips, director of the Holocaust Teacher Training Program.

"Sometimes the teachers know nothing about the Holocaust when they walk into the room," said Phillips, whose four-year-old program is funded by UIA Federations Canada and the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario. "For many students, this is the first time they've met a Holocaust survivor."

For the first time last month the Holocaust Teacher Training Program gave educational workshops at British Columbia colleges. Sessions were held at Thompson Rivers University in Kamloops and the University of Northern British Columbia in Prince George as well as at UBC. About 400 student teachers took part.

While a daylong workshop cannot hope to teach the students everything there is to know about the Holocaust, it does provide a foundation upon which they can build their own knowledge and gives them instruction on methods of teaching the Holocaust.

"The biggest impact we've had is in the number of teacher candidates we've been able to reach," says Phillips. "We started with 1,000 teachers a year, but in total now we've reached about 6,000. As a result, there's a definite increase in the amount of Holocaust education that's happening at the classroom level."

The Holocaust Teacher Training Program is provided free to colleges and universities across Canada. In the beginning, Phillips had to call the colleges to tell them about the program, but these days word has spread and the educational institutions are contacting him.

At UBC-Okanagan, Vicki Green, an associate professor in the faculty of education, said the program "was extremely beneficial for the 140 student teachers, as the oral history with the insight of time augmented with documents, photographs, DVD recordings and other narratives create a context for student teachers to locate their experience."

After the program, students were thoughtful, reflective and pensive, she added. "Some were overwhelmed by the experience of meeting Vera Schiff, who created such an intimate environment that her teaching was powerful and memorable for the student teachers. They are so bombarded with media that it was an experience to be in a very quiet room listening to an exceptional speaker recount historical events in a personal context for them."

Green said she would have no qualms about recommending the Holocaust Teacher Training Program to other educators. "The curriculum materials are excellent, the workshop presenters are exceptional and the message given is unforgettable.

"The likely aftermath of the program will be a sharing of the students' experience with family, friends and neighbours," she added. "Student teachers will be more knowledgeable and sensitive when teaching the Holocaust in schools, will investigate issues on their own and be more aware of Canada's role in international affairs."

Beth Pye agreed. A teacher at Loughborough Public School in Kingston, Ont., she has attended every Holocaust workshop her school board has hosted. "I feel there's not a day that goes by that I don't link something to the Holocaust in some small way," she said. "It's not in the curriculum, it's not something we cover… but you find ways to put it into the curriculum."

After learning about the Holocaust, students in Pye's grades 7 and 8 classes wore paper clips on their clothing all winter in the 2005-06 school year. The clips were a way for them to identify with the Jews' suffering in the Holocaust, especially after the students learned that Norwegians in Nazi Europe had worn paper clips to demonstrate their support for Jews who had to wear yellow armbands.

"They wore them all winter, and I just sat there like a bawling fool," Pye told the Kingston Whig-Standard.

Phillips regularly receives correspondence and e-mails from teachers telling him about their classroom Holocaust education projects.

"These workshops are one way of ensuring that the Holocaust remains at the forefront for teachers to study and teach about," he said.

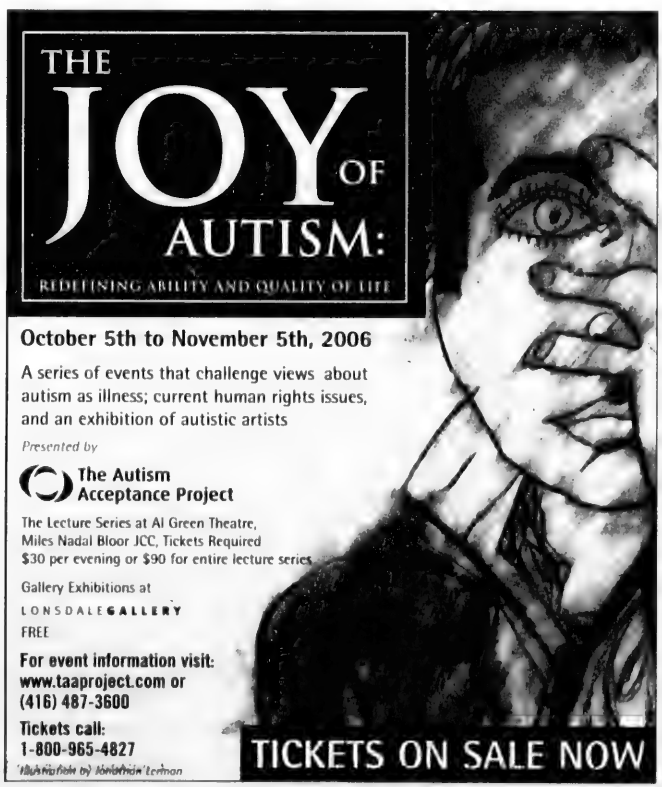
She and Ottawa director of NCSY, Bram Bregman, worked on bringing Torah High to the community. They enlisted Rabbi Yehuda Simes, a local educator, to be its director.

"I really believe that this is a prototype that could be used anywhere," said Rabbi Simes. "These are kids in public schools who still want some connection with Jewish education, if it is done in a warm and welcoming, non-threatening way."

Initial enrolment of more than 40 students has exceeded all expectations, and the two courses that are offered, which began on Sept. 11, quickly filled to beyond capacity. "The participation level is fantastic," said Rabbi Simes, "and we have had to offer each class twice, so we are working every day."

Students can take a philosophy course that gives them a Ministry of Education high school credit, as well as a mitzvah action course (MAC) that allows them to accumulate their compulsory 40 hours of volunteer work for a credit. MAC meets four times a month – three meetings to discuss the importance of a mitzvah and one in which to perform the mitzvah. The class votes on the mitzvah they will undertake.



Winnipegger seeks to link Israelis living in Canada

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Five years ago, Ron East's career path was radically altered when the Israeli-born elementary school teacher was assaulted by a trespasser on his school's playground.

A resulting head injury caused some brain damage. He was hospitalized for a long time, and while he has largely recovered, the Winnipeg resident still has problems with his memory.

Despite the trauma he has experienced, East retains a positive outlook on life. Over the past couple of years, he has found new purpose. He has found happiness with a new wife, Shirley, and he's looking forward to becoming a father for the first time.

But with a return to teaching not in the cards, he's turned his energies to building Canada Sheli, a social networking group for Israelis in Winnipeg and across Canada that he founded earlier this year.

East came to Winnipeg with his family in 1982 at age 11. (His father, Yoram, was a high-ranking Israel Defence Forces officer in southern Lebanon who has established a reputation here as a journalist and commentator on Israel and the Middle East.)

"When we came here, there were perhaps 200 Israelis living in Winnipeg," East said. "There was an attempt made in the early 1980s to form an organization for Israelis living in Winnipeg, but it fell apart because of too much factionalism."

East went back to Israel in 1988 to serve in the military, returning to Winnipeg in 1992.

With the rapid growth of Winnipeg's Israeli population over the past couple of years – East estimates there are now about 800 Israelis living here, due to Manitoba's liberal immigration policies – East felt there was a need for a new group offering activities and programs in Hebrew.

"Nobody was doing anything here," he said.

Earlier this year, East met with Rami Kleinmann, the Jewish National Fund's longtime shaliach in Winnipeg (who is now also the national shaliach for Canada). A hallmark of Kleinmann's work has been to reach out to groups beyond the local Jewish community.

"We were talking about the need to reach out to Israelis living in Canada," he said. "I volunteered to be the organizer."

Canada Sheli began in February as a Hebrew-language monthly newspaper that East put together. The free paper was distributed to Winnipeg Israelis at places they are known to frequent.

"People started calling and asking about events for Israelis," East said. "So we started organizing joint programs with the JNF and other community organizations."

A singalong in the spring attracted about 80 people. East and Canada Sheli also organized the first pro-Israel rally here after Israel's war with Hezbollah broke in July.

A couple of weeks ago, the group hosted popular Israeli talk show host Eitan Danzig, who staged a show in Winnipeg. His guests included former IDF intelligence officer Avi Shachar, who now lives in Toronto, as well as Ehud Davidson, the mayor of Kfar Saba who spoke about the state of war preparedness in Israel, and Israeli Arie Lavy, a Winnipeger who was a prisoner of war in Egypt for several months after the 1973 war.

"We have started a weekly soccer program on Sundays and a monthly Israeli movie night," East said. "We also have another singalong planned."

The newspaper has spun off a weekly e-newsletter that has nearly 1,000 subscribers. While most live in Winnipeg, East said the e-newsletter has subscribers across Canada, and even in Europe.

Through Canada Sheli, East is also using the Internet to raise money for IDF soldiers. "Our blue-ribbon campaign has raised close to $1,500 worldwide," he said.

East has also become a one-stop information source for new Israeli arrivals to the city. He invites them to his home and introduces them to people around the community. He also helps them do such things as get cellphones, open bank accounts and lease cars – help, he said, that goes beyond what's provided by the Jewish Child and Family Service.

His next goal is to establish Canada Sheli branches in communities across Canada. While Toronto's large Israeli community is well established, he said, Israelis elsewhere would benefit from Canada Sheli's activities.

He praised Kleinmann, Shelley Faintuch of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and Tamar Barr of the city's Rady Jewish Community Centre for supporting Canada Sheli.

"I used to chase the money like most people," East said. "But since my brain injury, I have come to realize that it's not about the money, but rather what you are passionate about. My passions are Israel and brain injury awareness. [He also runs a brain injury awareness organization called My Brain Matters.] These past two years have been the most beautiful two years of my life."

Longtime educator 'was respected by all'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Shani Kurtz, a stalwart of Jewish education in Toronto, died recently in Israel of pneumonia after a long battle with Parkinson's disease. She was 77.

Kurtz was born and raised in New York, and earned her BA in education at City College. Later, she got her PhD in education from the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE).

After preparing for life in Israel at a Shomer Hadati model farm in New Jersey, she made aliyah and worked teaching kindergarten in Kfar Darom, a kibbutz in Gaza. There, she met her husband Yumi (Benyamin). After two years, the couple moved to Toronto.

Kurtz taught Grade 1 Hebrew for many years at Eitz Chaim Day School. Her daughter-in-law, Debbie, who spoke for the family, said she "felt that she could teach every child to read Hebrew – even when the parents had given up."

Shani Kurtz

In 1971, she organized and headed the first Task Force on Jewish Education. Until her retirement about 10 years ago, she served as an educational consultant to what is now UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education.

She also founded and was a professor in the Jewish education program at York University, where she arranged and supervised students' teaching placements.

Kurtz was a founding president of Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women. CJN columnist Rebecca Nadler, another Mekorot founder, said that Kurtz "strove for excellence in Jewish education for men and women."

After spending her summers in Jerusalem attending various women's institutes, she felt there was a need for such an organization in Toronto, Nadler said.

Kurtz never lost her zest for learning and teaching, and she continued to take courses and give shiurim until very recently, Nadler added.

Even when she became ill and had to use a walker, Debbie Kurtz said that her mother-in-law "was always running. Her doctor said she should slow down – she refused. The week before she died, she went to her grandson's bar mitzvah, where she had to climb up and down 30 steps.

"She lived life to the fullest."

While Shani Kurtz "put a high priority on intelligence and had little patience for narishkeit," Nadler said, she nevertheless was always comfortable talking about everyday topics, such as her recipe for cholent, which she was happy to share.

Nadler and Debbie Kurtz described her as "a lady," saying that she always dressed beautifully and insisted on having manicures, even while in the hospital. As well, her table was always set with china and crystal.

She loved her grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and they all loved her, Debbie Kurtz said. "She made sure she was an integral part of their daily life. She was so proud of all of them. She spent hours on the phone with each of them."

Although she had owned an apartment in Israel for some time, it was only two years ago that she moved there permanently.

"She loved Israel, and she loved living in Israel," said Debbie Kurtz. For years she belonged to the Ilana chapter of Emunah Women and worked hard to raise money for Israel.

She was very close to the members of the chapter and to her other friends.

"She was a good friend, and a good relative – she kept the family together," her daughter-in-law said.

Asked to sum up her mother-in-law, Debbie noted that "she had friends across the Jewish spectrum. She was respected by all, and she respected all."

Shani Kurtz was predeceased by her husband Yumi. She is survived by her three children, Yitzhak and his wife Debbie of Toronto; Hindy Flom and her husband Chaim, and Reva Friedman and her husband Alan, in Israel; her brothers Rabbi Avraham Gross of Israel, and Eli Gross of New York; and 19 grandchildren and six great-grandchildren.

Israel to welcome descendants of 'lost' Jewish tribe

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — A group of 218 people from a remote mountainous corner of northeastern India who claim descent from one of the lost biblical tribes will be immigrating to Israel as recognized Jews for the first time.

The aliyah of members from the Bnei Menashe community to Israel is a turning point, said Michael Freund, founder of Shavei Israel, which assists "lost Jews" seeking to return to the Jewish people.

"This is a major historical event, because these members of a lost tribe of Israel, after 27 centuries of wandering in exile, will at last be coming home," he said.

News of the planned arrival in November of 218 Bnei Menashe, who have already undergone official conversion in India, was made public last week after it was leaked to the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot.

The government decision to bring the 218 to Israel followed months of bureaucratic wrangling in which Israel's Interior Ministry and Absorption Ministry balked at plans to bring them here, Freund told JTA.

Advocates have been working for years to convince Israeli authorities that the Bnei Menashe were indeed long-lost Jews who had returned to the faith. They hope this group will pave the way for others in the community to also make aliyah.

The group of immigrants went through conversion courses and were approved for conversion by rabbinical judges sent to India last year by Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar.

Rabbi Amar has declared Bnei Menashe "descendants of the Jewish people" and has been working to help facilitate the aliyah of those who want to live in Israel.

To date, many of the some 1,000 members of the community who arrived in the country as tourists and later converted to Judaism became citizens and live in West Bank settlements. Some also lived in settlements in the Gaza Strip until last year's Israeli withdrawal.

The decision to place them predominately in settlements has drawn criticism. Their advocates say the move was not a political but a practical decision. They say the settlements were among the only communities in the country willing to financially help the Bnei Menashe who arrived in Israel and had to spend their first year studying for conversion, without much time to hold down jobs.

Tzvi Khaute, 32, lives in the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Arba, on the outskirts of Hebron, where the largest number of Bnei Menashe reside. He welcomes the government decision to bring more of his community to Israel as Jewish immigrants for the first time.

"It really is a dream come true," said Khaute, who studies in a yeshiva part time and works for the Shavei offices.

The group that is scheduled to arrive in November will be living for the first year in absorption centres in the northern towns of Carmiel and Nazareth Ilit.

Some 7,000 Bnei Menashe live in the northeastern Indian states of Mizoram and Manipur. They trace their descent to the tribe of Menashe, one of the 10 tribes expelled from ancient Israel by the Assyrians.

They claim their ancestors wandered eastward toward China, then eventually settled to the south in what is now northeastern India and nearby Myanmar.

Most of the community converted to Christianity at the turn of the 20th century. In recent decades, some have returned to the Judaism their ancestors practised for centuries, including observing Shabbat, keeping the laws of kashrut, practising circumcision on the eighth day of a baby boy's life and observing the laws of family purity.

The Jewish Agency will be facilitating the absorption of the Bnei Menashe into Israel.

Squandering Israel's credibility

Commentary

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post

One of the most disturbing things about Israel's political culture is the ease with which governments squander credibility. This is a resource far more precious than money, because once gone, it can never be replaced. Yet time after time, governments have sacrificed long-term credibility on the altar of short-term interests.

Consider two recent examples. One was the government's decision earlier this month to trim the budget by slashing the number of Falash Mora allowed to immigrate from Ethiopia from 300 to 150 a month – thereby reversing last year's pledge to double the quota, from 300 to 600.

This decision will obviously cause humanitarian distress, both for the Falash Mora waiting in overcrowded camps in Ethiopia and for the relatives awaiting them in Israel. It also contradicts the Kadima government's alleged concern for demography – the declared reason for its proposed unilateral withdrawal from most of the West Bank. Some 20,000 immigrants of Jewish descent, who are eager to rejoin the Jewish people and willing to convert, would clearly be a demographic asset.

But what makes the decision particularly outrageous is that when the cabinet originally voted to double the quota, it asked American Jews to raise $100 million to finance the Ethiopians' absorption. Then-prime minister (and Kadima founder) Ariel Sharon even appealed personally to U.S. Jewish leaders when he visited New York last year. And American Jewry responded: the United Jewish Communities have thus far raised $70 million for this purpose. "We suspended the rest of our activity and focused on this campaign," a senior UJC official told the press.

Now, American Jewish donors and fundraisers are furious. The UJC even took the unusual step of publicly accusing the government of reneging on its promises.

And the negative consequences are obvious. "We're dealing with a deep problem of trust here," the UJC official said. "Next time we come to ask [donors] for money, they might think twice." Left unsaid, but equally obvious, was the corollary: next time an Israeli government requests assistance from American Jewish organizations, these groups might think twice about soliciting their donors.

Over the years, Israel has asked for – and received – American Jewry's financial help on many vital projects. And it will undoubtedly want such help again in the future. But for the sake of an extremely short-term interest – cutting the budget without upsetting political allies – the government has squandered its credibility with American Jewish donors, thereby making it harder for Israel to tap this resource in the future.

The second example is the government's handling of the settlers evacuated from Gaza last summer. Last week, Ha'aretz published a summary of the state of resettlement efforts 13 months after the pullout, and nine months after Ehud Olmert became prime minister – not for those settlers who resisted the evacuation, but for those who acted "responsibly" and co-operated with the government. The bottom line: construction on permanent housing has yet to begin in even one of the 18 locations earmarked for resettling evacuees.

In Nitzanim, which is slated to house hundreds of families who signed agreements with the government before the pullout, no work at all has been done. In Ashkelon, where 150 families agreed to move prior to the disengagement, the government has not even finished buying the land for their promised houses. In Mavki'im, where 24 families agreed to relocate before the withdrawal, work has not even begun on the infrastructure, let alone the houses. And these are not the worst cases: several planned communities do not even have approved master plans for construction – a process that can take years.

This conduct is clearly immoral: having evicted these families from their homes to serve its own policies, the government has an ethical obligation to at least keep its promises on resettlement.

But quite aside from morality, the sheer stupidity of such behaviour is mind-boggling. After all, this government campaigned on a platform of kicking an additional 80,000 Jews – 10 times Gaza's number – out of their homes, and it therefore has a clear interest in encouraging co-operation rather than resistance.

Instead, by breaking its resettlement promises to the Gaza evacuees, the government has virtually guaranteed that any future evacuation will meet with far fiercer resistance than the Gaza pullout did. Because if you are going to be a homeless refugee regardless of whether you co-operate or resist, why would anyone choose to co-operate?

It would be comforting to think that such behaviour is unique to the Olmert government. Unfortunately, previous governments have been no better.

Ehud Barak's government, for instance, opted to betray our ally, the South Lebanon Army, by fleeing Lebanon overnight in May 2000 rather than risk Israeli soldiers' lives to secure an orderly retreat. It did not even give SLA members and their families 24 hours' notice in which to pack their belongings; they had to flee with whatever they had on hand, which left most of them penniless refugees.

And there are far too many other examples – such as the decades of budgetary discrimination against the Druse, the one Israeli Arab community loyal to the state. In all the above cases, Israeli governments sacrificed a long-term interest – credibility with friends, allies and even its own citizens – for short-term financial or military convenience.

Israel takes fresh look at Golan

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — With criticism of the handling of this summer's war in Lebanon continuing to mount, Israel's military elite is struggling to deal both with the war's political fallout and its implications for military strategy.

As they ponder the threats to northern Israel, these strategists are thinking not only about Hezbollah, but about the questions this war raises for Israel's other northern front: Syria.

Specifically, does the rocket-based strategy Hezbollah adopted in the war make the Golan Heights more indispensable than ever in a potential conflict with Syria? Or does the enemy's reliance on missile technology detract from the importance of territorial buffer zones?

"There are those who claim that because of the long-range weaponry, the importance of the Golan is diminished. It is not annulled, but it is diminished," said David Hacham, an Arab affairs adviser in Israel's Defence Ministry. "And there are those – also experts, both sides are experts – who say that the importance of the Golan, as a base of departure for attack, is unparalleled."

"Personally, I believe the Golan is something that cannot be relinquished," Hacham said. "Even if there is a war and they use long-range weaponry, and they hit Tiberias and even Tel Aviv, this does not convey the importance of the Golan. Because if you want to launch a counterattack, it is a lot easier to go from the Golan into Syrian territory than if you are in Lebanon."

Captured from Syria during the 1967 Six Day War, the Golan is widely considered vital to the security of northern Israel. The plateau overlooks most of the country's north – which southern Lebanon does not – and from 1948 to 1967 Syrian gunners used their perch on the heights to shell the kibbutzim and small towns of the Upper Galilee.

Israel's conquest of the Golan pushed hostile Syrian forces back behind a United Nations-patrolled ceasefire line, brought valuable water sources under Israeli control and gave Israel a place from which to monitor the Syrians. At its highest point, the Israeli part of the Golan is more than 7,000 feet, with the Syrian capital within view.

The threat of missiles from nearby enemy states is not new to Israelis. Former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein famously deployed Scud missiles against Israel during the first Gulf War in 1991, to little material effect. But the thousands of Katyusha rockets fired by Hezbollah during this latest war – and the physical and psychological damage they wreaked – has many Israelis reassessing the state of their security.

Israel Defence Forces officials refused to be interviewed for this story. But a former chief of the military's northern command, Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levin, told JTA that the war in Lebanon had made the Golan more important than ever.

"You have to get faster to the heart of the threat, which in this case would be Damascus," Levin said. The war, he explained, "strengthens the idea that you have to be in a position where you can inflict significant damage to the threatening state as quickly as possible."

A former deputy head of the Mossad spy agency, Levin now is an executive at an Israeli security company called Suspect Detection Systems.

Faced with a future in which missiles may be the primary medium of attack, some Israelis say the key to security is not holding onto the Golan but rather ceding it to Syria in exchange for a guarantee of peace.

On Aug. 21, just after the end of the war in Lebanon, Internal Security Minister Avi Dichter announced, "In exchange for peace with Syria, Israel can leave the Golan Heights."

That assessment elicited outrage from many in Israel.

This week, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert weighed in on the matter after Syrian government officials said they were willing to restart talks over the Golan Heights.

"As long as I am prime minister, the Golan will remain forever in our hands because it is an inseparable part of the State of Israel," Olmert told the Orthodox Israeli newspaper Mishpacha. Israel annexed the Golan in 1981.

Many Israelis are reluctant to part with the Golan not only because of its strategic value, but because it's home to nearly 20,000 residents and contains precious water resources, valuable agricultural land, Israel's only ski resort, prized wineries, miles of beautiful hiking trails and scenic vacation villages.

Moreover, the area now has been in Israeli hands for nearly as long as it was controlled by Syria. And as long as Syria represents even a minimal threat to the Jewish state, Israel sees no reason to seek a change in the status quo.

Meanwhile, Syria's position as an international pariah state and terrorist sponsor keeps the pressure off Israel to cede the Golan. The regime in Damascus still supports Hezbollah, hosts the leadership of Palestinian terrorist groups, ignores demands that it allow inspections of possible weapons of mass destruction programs and is on America's list of terrorist-sponsoring regimes. It's also the subject of U.S. sanctions.

That's why Olmert was able to deride both Syrian President Bashar Assad's recent calls for peace and his threats of war. In the past month, Syrian officials have simultaneously rattled their war sabres by saying they won't rely forever on peaceful means to try to recover the Golan, while declaring themselves open for peace talks.

For now, it appears, Israel has no interest in putting the Golan on the market.

Lawyer alleges SNCF has been stonewalling for decades

During the Nazi occupation, the collaborationist, anti-Semitic and pro-German French government based in Vichy reduced French Jews to second-class citizenship, rounded them up and shipped them to Auschwitz – a concentration camp in Poland – via Drancy.

All in all 75,000 Jews, of whom some 24,500 were French nationals, were taken to Auschwitz through Drancy during the Vichy period.

Only about 2,500 returned.

SNCF, formed in 1938 after France's five main railway companies were amalgamated, transported Jews in cattle cars and invoiced the state for third-class tickets.

In the Lipietz case, SNCF argued that it was pressured by the Nazis to co-operate.

But a court in Toulouse ruled that SNCF neither made an effort to protest the transports, nor treated their Jewish passengers humanely.

This past June, the court in Toulouse ordered SNCF to pay 62,000 Euros (about $88,500 Cdn) in reparations to the Lipietz family.

Bitton bases his claim on two grounds.

"SNCF did nothing – ever – to try to stop or slow down the process and save lives. SNCF was under Nazi pressure, true. But SNCF had a margin for manoeuvre in its treatment of Jews."

Heartlessly crammed into SNCF wagons where they could hardly move or breathe, Jewish deportees went without water and food for days, Bitton said.

"Some people died en route to Auschwitz. There are no statistics as to their numbers, but many died."

If the case reaches trial, Bitton intends to ask the courts for 150,000 Euros ($211,000 Cdn) for Jews who perished on the way or in Auschwitz, and 75,000 Euros ($105,000 Cdn) for survivors.

Bitton said that SNCF has been stonewalling for decades.

"For 40 years, they refused to open their archives, and therefore, survivors were unable to determine SNCF's role."

During the 1990s, SNCF relented and released a batch of documents. SNCF then asked a panel of historians to study its role in the Holocaust.

Their voluminous report, issued in 1996, prompted survivors in the United States to launch the first lawsuit against the railway, but it failed.

Although SNCF officials were never put on trial for their complicity in the deportations, the management was summarily dismissed after World War II, according to Bitton.

Asked whether he is hopeful regarding the outcome, Bitton said, "We expect justice to be done. As one of my clients told me, 'What I want is justice, to make sure this company pays for its wrong-doing.'"

Bitton is not alone in his efforts. Several lawyers in France, representing many more plaintiffs, are pressing SNCF and the French government for a compensation package.

Plantiff wants railway to admit guilt

"It's not the money," said Norma Nadir. "I'm looking for some admittance of guilt. That's what the whole family is looking for."

Nadir (not her real name), a Toronto woman who prefers to remain anonymous, is speaking on behalf of her 85-year-old mother.

Nadir's British-born mom, having lost 13 relatives during the Holocaust, has joined 19 Canadian families in a worldwide lawsuit against France's national railway company, the Société Nationale des Chemins de fer Français – known as SNCF – and the French government.

Nadir's lawyer in Paris, Avi Bitton, claims that SNCF, mostly owned by the government, was responsible for shipping her relatives to the Auschwitz concentration camp, where they perished along with more than one million Jews.

Her mother's uncle, aunt and cousins, as well as their children, were deported to Poland.

Five of the deportees were citizens of Poland, while the rest were French nationals.

Nadir contacted Bitton several months ago after he placed ad in The Canadian Jewish News.

Before signing on with Bitton, she had been doing research into her family tree and had tried to get in touch with lawyers in the United States who had filed a similar lawsuit. She had also attended a Holocaust memorial ceremony in France.

She has no doubt whatsoever that SNCF is guilty.

"The railway had the responsibility of putting together the passenger lists, and they billed the Vichy government for the fares. They were very aware of what they were doing."

Is she confident Bitton can win?

"Quite honestly, I don't know, but we hope that Bitton's expertise will prevail."

She does not expect immediate results.

"My guess is that it will be a long, drawn-out process in the courts. But we're willing to wait. We already have been waiting for over 60 years."

Canada Center in Metullah trying to recover

By LIONEL GAFFEN
Jerusalem Post

METULLAH — The Canada Center reopened its doors to the public after the war in the north ended, but the conflict left deep scars on the home of Israel's only Olympic-size ice rink.

Two major facilities, the heated swimming pool and, more significantly, the main skating rink, were still closed two weeks ago, although the pool opened before the Rosh Hashanah weekend.

In addition to being a tourist attraction, the rink is the training and playing area for all indoor winter sports in Israel, including ice hockey, figure skating and speed skating.

"We've started hockey practices once again, but the space is very limiting," said Sergei Matin, the president of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF). "Many of the youths who were taking part in the program last year have returned. The junior national team will be leaving the country for a two-week tour of North America on Oct. 8, in order to give them proper ice and training time with other teams.

National ice hockey team using smaller rink

"The senior and junior national hockey leagues will begin official play on Oct. 27, and hopefully the main ice will be reopened by then."

Alan Maislin, the chair of the IIHF, was less upbeat. "It's very disappointing that the main rink hasn't reopened, and it will have an impact on the success of the northern Israel hockey program," he told the Jerusalem Post from Montreal.

The greatest impact of the closure has been on the Israel Ice Skating Federation (IISF), which handles all competitive figure skating and speed skating.

For athletes to continue their training, the IISF was forced to spend a significant amount of its funding on sending skaters to training camps overseas.

"We sent seven figure skaters to a training camp in Slovenia from July 27 to Aug. 23," said IISF secretary general Carol Hasday. "As well, we sent a coach and seven short track speed skaters to a training camp in Slovakia from Aug. 3 to Sept. 15.

"Genia Krasnopolsky and a chaperone [were] in Moscow from Sept. 6 to 19. [He then went] to the junior Grand Prix in Romania. Sergei Kotov, Israel's senior international male skater this year, is... in Hungary until Sept. 27, in order to prepare for the season-opening tournament in Obertsdorf, Germany, at the end of the month."

IISF chair Boris Chait is frustrated by the delays in reopening the Canada Center facilities. "We contend that the management and the directorate of the Canada Center have been irresponsible since the end of the war over the failure to reopen both the heated pool and in particular, the Olympic-sized rink," he said in an interview.

"In order to continue the training of some of our athletes, we were forced to send them overseas. The worst part for them was that when they returned, they faced a closed ice rink and couldn't continue training at all.

"Due to the situation, we have had to cancel two junior Grand Prix tournaments so far this season, and it's as though the entire training camp was completely wasted. You can't have skaters staying idle off the ice for weeks at a time, which is what happened on their return.

"I feel that the Canada Center should have set an example to the entire northern community and should be showing the world that we're back in business as usual," he added. "A great deal of money is provided by the Ministry of Sport in order to have the main ice rink open."

Shmulik Ben-Shachar, the manager of the Canada Center, did not know when the full-size rink would reopen. "As far as the main skating rink is concerned, while we will make necessary repairs at this time, I can't give you a date when it will reopen to the public," Ben-Shachar said. "The small rink [which is one-third the size of the main rink] is sufficient for the use of the general skating public... We don't have the funds necessary to maintain the large rink."

Ben-Shachar noted that the Canada Center regularly relies on a variety of sources to maintain its operations and it still does not break even.

"The Canada Center is running at a substantial annual deficit, and this is after receiving money from the various institutions that provide money for ice use, including the Ministry of Sport, the Israel Ice Hockey Federation, the Israel Ice Skating Federation, etc.

• "United Israel Appeal [Canada], who helped build the Canada Center, has not supplied funds for its ongoing maintenance since 2005. I hope that the Ministry of Sport will come to the decision to pay for the difference in cost in order for the main ice rink to open."

Menachem Kali, the new chair of the Canada Center directorate that took office at the beginning of July, disagreed. He said UIA Canada does continue to support the centre.

"It's too soon for me to make any comments about the Canada Center, but UIA Canada is still providing funding to the Canada Center."

More Microsoft investment

Microsoft will make its sixth investment in Israel's technology market with an agreement announced last week to buy Ra'anana-based startup Gteko Ltd. The acquisition price was not disclosed, but sources close to the transaction estimated the price tag at around $100 million (US).

New northern commander

Israel appointed a new military commander for its Lebanese and Syrian fronts. The Defence Ministry named Maj.-Gen. Gadi Eizenkot, a former military operations chief, to head its northern command. Eizenkot replaces Maj.-Gen. Udi Adam, who resigned earlier this month amid charges that he mishandled Israel's offensive against Hezbollah. Others claimed he was a scapegoat. Israel's failure to crush the Lebanese militia has stirred concern that Hezbollah's patron, Syria, could also go to war in a bid to regain the Golan Heights.

Interpol Europe accepts Israel

Israel was accepted last week into the European branch of Interpol, the international police agency. The acceptance came five years after Israel made its original request. A spokesperson for the Israeli police, Mickey Rosenfeld, called the move "a breakthrough," saying that 70 per cent of Israel's international police operations occur in Europe.

Four life sentences for convicted murderer

A member of Shvut Rachel, in the West Bank, who shot and killed four Palestinians in an attempt to scuttle Israel's pullout from the Gaza Strip last summer, was sentenced to four life sentences by the Jerusalem District Court after being convicted early September on four counts of murder. Asher Weisgan, 38, who had subsequently called for the assassination of former prime minister Ariel Sharon, had been found mentally fit to stand trial by a psychiatrist who examined him under court order.

Hungarian Jews worry after protests

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — Peace has been restored to Budapest after violent anti-government protests tinged with anti-Semitism, but some Jews, particularly the elderly, worry about the impact of the turbulent political climate on Hungary's Jewish community.

"Older Jews feel worried, even threatened. They saw some men on the television wearing the old Hungarian Nazi uniform," said Ferenc Olti, a banker and longtime Jewish activist.

Demonstrations in the capital against Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany broke out last month after a speech he gave to his Socialist Party in which he said he and other party officials had lied to voters "morning, evening and night" and had "done nothing", was made public.

Earlier this month, the country's economic forecast had to be revised downward as the country's budget deficit ballooned to 10.1 per cent of GDP, the highest in the European Union.

Protests, led by a few thousand right-wing extremists and soccer hooligans, became violent last week, with attacks on the state television station and some 200 arrests.

Many of the protesters wore fascist symbols. One was reported to have saluted Hitler, while others expressed support for the Arrow Cross, the wartime Hungarian party that murdered thousands of Jews during World War II. One protester reportedly displayed a sign that read "Jews to Auschwitz."

Later, there was a peaceful demonstration of about 40,000 in front of the Parliament seeking the prime minister's resignation.

It was the largest public protest since the unsuccessful 1956 Hungarian revolution, but shortly afterward only a few hundred people were picketing the Parliament Building in Budapest.

Gabor Szanto, editor of Szombat, a Hungarian Jewish magazine, said, "Jews were afraid something would happen to them over Rosh Hashanah, but there was no incident, so things have calmed down."

Senior right-wing opposition leaders are still pressuring Gyurcsany and his government to resign, however. Whether the protests and political instability continue will largely be determined by the results of municipal elections, which coincided with Yom Kippur Eve.

If there is a win for incumbent Budapest Mayor Gabor Demszky, a supporter of the prime minister, further protests are doubtful, analysts say. But if Demszky loses what is a tight race to his right-wing opponent, the prime minister's critics will feel emboldened, demonstrations may begin anew – and the risk of anti-Jewish propaganda cannot be counted out.

Szanto, however, said many on the right do not want the stain of anti-Semitism on their campaign.

"There were some phrases uttered by protesters at the earlier demonstrations, like 'dirty Jews,' but it was very rare. When it happened, other protesters shouted they didn't come here to listen to this," he said. "I heard that one of the protesters read the names of 50 politicians and journalists, some of whom are Jews, who 'should be made to disappear,' but such incidents were very rare," he said.

A protest leader who opposes the prime minister called Szanto "and told me that I should inform him of anti-Semitic activity by demonstrators so that it would be stopped," Szanto said.

Several observers interviewed by JTA said that although the main right-wing opposition party in Hungary, Fidesz, is not anti-Semitic, it has some anti-Semitic members and is supported by several media outlets that have printed anti-Jewish editorials.

Women pray in a tent outside the Parliament Building in Budapest during the rioting last week. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Olti, 57, does not take comfort in the dwindling number of protesters. Unlike Szanto, he argues that the expression of anti-Jewish feelings is tolerated and even encouraged by Fidesz.

"During the larger protests, Fidesz parliamentary members spoke under the Hungarian Nazi flag. They said nothing against it, even though it was next to them," Olti said.

Zsuzsa Fritz, director of the Balint Jewish Community Center in Budapest, agrees that the elderly are worried, even though the demonstrations have tapered off. Anti-Jewish aspects of the initial rioting brought back memories of the 1956 insurrection against Soviet rule, Fritz said. The 50th anniversary of the failed revolution is next month.

"The prisons were emptied. Then criminals, including many fascists, joined with the student movement against the Russians. They went around hanging Jews. People blamed Jews for the Soviet oppression because there were some well-known Jews in the Communist party leadership," she said.

"I don't feel anti-Semitism on the street. The extremist rightish people don't protest against the Jews and any Jewish interest," Agnes Szalai wrote in an e-mail. She lives in Prague but was back home in Budapest for the Jewish holidays.

"Everybody was shocked what has happened on the street on Monday and Tuesday night. But now everybody lives as they lived before – in the morning the people go to work, [then they] go for lunch. During the day, the city is full of people. In the evening, the youngsters go to watch films, go for dinner with there friends and enjoy the nice weather," she continued. "That's all what I can see. It is not revolution, just because some crazy people preach in front of the Parliament."

government for an international force to intervene, as though they are part of the solution, when in fact, they are the source of the problem.

UN humanitarian aid head Jan Egeland made this disparaging statement recently: "I cannot give a starker warning than to say that we are at a point where even hope may escape us and the lives of hundreds of thousands could be needlessly lost."

Some 26,000 government soldiers and the regime's proxy militia, the Janjaweed, have relaunched widespread attacks in Darfur, which many fear could reignite the systematic murder of African Sudanese that has not been seen since the early days of the genocide.

Humanitarian aid groups have continued to withdraw and curtail operations as they have been attacked. The Darfur Peace Agreement, signed in May, outlined the steps to be taken to achieve peace in the area. But little of it has been implemented, and African groups continue to be marginalized. Only one small faction of the anti-government rebels, under the leadership of Mini Minawi, signed the accord. However, Minawi then proceeded to attack larger rebel factions in order to entrench his power base. Clearly, the situation is about to spiral out of control without a robust international intervention.

On Aug. 31, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1706 authorizing at least 17,000 multinational troops with a strong mandate to protect civilians and humanitarian aid workers and disarm both sides. Twelve members of the Security Council voted in favour, while China, Russia and Qatar abstained. However, there is one troubling stipulation in the resolution. The government of Sudan has been "invited to consent" to such a UN initiative.

It is unlikely that the response will be a cordial and embracing RSVP. Based on rumblings from Khartoum, the government of Sudan categorically rejects any kind of international intervention – even though the undermanned and ill-equipped African Union Force that is trying to help stop the violence in the area has a feckless mandate. It also realizes it is unable to provide security to a region as large as France and has asked for help.

Thus the UN forces sanctioned by the Security Council must either wait for Sudan's unlikely acquiescence or the mission will proceed non-consensually, if at all.

It was with this mind, in an unprecedented show of solidarity, that rallies were held on Sept 17 in more than 40 countries around the globe. A Day for Darfur implored the international community to deploy the necessary forces without further delay.

In Canada, rallies or events were held in Vancouver, Calgary, Montreal, Toronto and Halifax. The unspeakable suffering of Darfuris resonates with Canadians and has led to the organization of a larger coalition called Save Darfur Canada (www.savedarfurcanada.org). Canadians want to make ending the carnage in western Sudan a foreign policy priority.

A Canadian Unity Statement, signed at the time by more than 50 faith-based, humanitarian and human rights groups, calls on Canada to use its diplomatic clout to ensure that the international force is deployed as soon as possible. Reports out of Ottawa indicate Canada could offer 300 to 400 soldiers, a squadron of CF-18s to enforce a no-fly zone and a digitalized communications network, all without jeopardizing the mission in Afghanistan.

If Canada is to lead and ask other countries to ante up, its credibility will be enhanced if it offers some soldiers and essential logistics to a peacemaking mission. Canada and the international community need to ensure that humanitarian aid levels are maintained. Security must be guaranteed to permit safe passage of this vital aid, with unhindered access to all who are in dire need. Finally, all elements of the Darfur Peace Agreement must be vigorously implemented, including the disarming of the Janjaweed.

The timing of the Sept. 17 rallies was not just linked to the critical situation in Darfur. It also coincided with the first anniversary of the United Nations' adoption of the doctrine of the Responsibility to Protect. This historic initiative was spearheaded and sponsored by Canada. It states unequivocally that if a sovereign nation is unable or unwilling to protect its innocent civilians from extreme harm, the international community must intervene.

It is unconscionable that the international community negotiates with, panders to and "invites consent" from the Khartoum regime that is responsible for egregious crimes against its own people.

Can one imagine a scenario in which Allied troops about to enter Germany in 1945 sought permission from Hitler and his odious regime to liberate the concentration camps there?

Jewish groups and individuals have been in the vanguard to end the unmitigated suffering in Darfur. Although never genuinely invoked, "Never again" resonates within our community. "Never again" can no longer remain a euphemism of lost opportunity to end genocide. It must become bold words in bold print that lead to bold action – a promise made and a commitment kept!

This is a watershed time for the world to act morally. Thousand of African lives hang in the balance. The theme of the Sept. 17 rallies proclaimed: "Protect Darfur now – time is running out!" If not now, then when? For if we fail this time, have we not failed, once more, the test of humanity?

Jewish online weekly launches on October 6

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Student Weekly, a new online publication for Jewish students, produced by Jewish students, is getting set to launch its first issue tomorrow, Oct. 6.

The U.S.-based "e-newspaper," which aims to connect Jewish students with the wider Jewish community, was developed by Adam Finkel, a University of Michigan student in response to recent surveys that suggest Jewish youth are becoming less interested in exploring their heritage.

"I was on a birthright israel trip and I really felt a sense of Jewish community. I came back and started reading surveys about young adults and about how they were disengaged," Finkel told The CJN in a phone interview from Ann Arbour, Mich., referring to the findings in a Hillel International study about American Jewish youth and another one titled Grande Soy Vanilla Latte with Cinnamon, No Foam: Jewish Identity and Community in a Time of Unlimited Choices, conducted by Reboot, a New York-based network of Jewish creative initiatives.

Finkel, 20, a third-year undergraduate, said he was motivated to engage Jewish young people who are becoming less involved in all things Jewish.

He approached the American Union of Jewish Students (AmUJS) with the idea to produce a free electronic weekly publication, and he got a small grant from Hillel International to fund the initiative.

Finkel is publisher of the paper, which students can download and print out, and has a network of about 20 volunteer student writers. He predicted that the $250 Hillel grant will cover the cost of e-mail marketing and maintaining the website, and will be enough to keep the weekly going for the next few months. He said he's working on finding advertisers.

"The Jewish Student Weekly is trying to keep the momentum of [the feeling of] Jewish community from birthright and other Jewish programs, and also to engage students," Finkel said.

According to the website, the weekly will "promote a generation of active, philanthropic and knowledgeable" Jews, and will help them "remember the sacrifice and strength of our past, to reflect on shared values of our teachings, respond to modern threats to our existence, and to repair the world because we can."

"We hope to feature news stories about issues affecting the Jewish community and human interest stories about young Jewish adults and what they are doing, how they are contributing to society."

He added that at the core of the web publication would be stories and features about issues that are relevant to the Jewish community at large, but he hopes to balance current events with lighter topics that would attract youth.

"For example, we have an article written about fall fashion: what is hot at Hillel for the fall, maybe what people were wearing during the High Holy Days," Finkel said.

"The typical Jewish student wouldn't be interested in reading just about what is going on in Jewish news, so we're trying to branch out into what a student would want to read. They like People magazine. They like human interest stories about their community and their peers."

He said he hopes that this publication – which is already beginning to attract a handful of Canadian students from York University and the University of Toronto who have visited the website and expressed interest in writing for the weekly – will influence his peers to start other Jewish-themed initiatives.

In an attempt to create some buzz for the student-run project, AmUJS is running a "Pimp My Shmata Contest." The student who offers the best suggestion of a student to profile wins an American Apparel fleece jacket.

Healthy, delicious dishes for Sukkot

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Jewish food is not traditionally known for its healthy qualities and is often perceived as heavy and loaded with fat – "a heart attack on a plate!" British cookbook author and alternative health expert Michael van Straten believes that this reputation is largely based on our limited knowledge of the food of northern and eastern Europe.

In his latest cookbook, The Healthy Jewish Cookbook (Kyle Cathie Ltd.), van Straten takes us on a fascinating culinary journey from the Mediterranean to Persia, Asia and the Far East. His recipes reflect the food of the Diaspora prepared by Jews who spread themselves around the world and developed their own cuisine unique to the countries they inhabited, yet still followed kosher requirements.

Van Straten's recipes emphasize the use of healthy ingredients, with small amounts of animal fat and protein. Many dishes are filled with grains, nuts, fruits and vegetables. There are over 100 recipes, created to reflect the tremendous variety of Jewish food. As a student, he would adapt his mother's Ashkenazi recipes so that they contained less fat and more nutrient-rich foods. Family photos add a delicious touch of nostalgia to this heartwarming book.

Van Straten writes, "As long as there are children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren who talk about their parents, aunts and uncles and pass on the family recipes from generation to generation, they will always be with us."

In the book, he includes a description of the major Jewish festivals. He explains that Sukkot is the Jewish equivalent of the harvest festival.

"Traditionally, Jews build a covered shelter outside where, for a week, all meals are eaten," he writes. "The roof should be made of evergreen branches like laurel, ivy, leylandii or any other suitable plant material, and the walls could be plywood, plastic sheeting, canvas or any other temporary material, though some part of the roof must be open to the sky. The building of this sukkah is very much a part of the festival."

Here are some delicious dishes from around the world that will travel well from your kitchen to your sukkah!

CHICKEN IN ORANGE SAUCE

Jews have been cultivating citrus fruits since biblical times. They became experts at growing these fruits, which they took to ancient Rome, Spain and the rest of the Mediterranean. The citron or etrog, which looks like a very large lemon, is an essential part of Sukkot, the Feast of Tabernacles, which celebrates the produce of vineyards, fields and orchards.

6 plump chicken thighs, skin removed juice and finely chopped peel of 2 large oranges
2 tsp. ground turmeric
1 tsp. black pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, finely chopped
2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
7 oz. chicken stock
3 large sprigs of tarragon

Put the chicken pieces, orange juice and peel, turmeric and pepper into a large bowl. Stir well to coat the chicken and leave covered in the fridge for at least 2 hours or overnight.

Heat the oil in a large flameproof casserole and gently saute the onion and garlic until just starting to soften. Take the chicken pieces out of the marinade, add to the casserole and brown all over, turning frequently. Tip in the marinade and stock and bring to a simmer. Add the tarragon. Simmer, covered, for about 45 minutes or until the chicken is tender. Serves 6.

Health Note: Oranges are widely used in Jewish cooking, and this low-fat recipe has the benefits of protein, vitamins and essential oils from the orange skin as well as the cancer-fighting properties of turmeric.

VEGETARIAN CHOLENT

Cholent, a slow-cooked casserole, gets its name from the medieval French "chaud" (hot) and "lent" (slow). Since it is forbidden for observant Jews to light a fire, turn on an oven or strike a match between the hours of sunset on Friday and sunset on Saturday, cholent is a common dish for Ashkenazi, Sephardi, Indian, Greek, Russian, Polish and British Jews.

The British and American versions owe their origins to eastern Europe, where cholent was eaten to keep out the bitter cold of winter. Just the thought of this massive pot of fatty meat, beans, marrow bones, dumplings, potatoes and even chicken fat is enough to cause a heart attack. This is the very worst of Jewish cooking.

In the villages of eastern Europe, housewives took their pots filled with the ingredients for cholent to the baker. The cholent pots went into the ovens when the last bread came out on Friday afternoon. At the end of the Sabbath, the pots were collected and taken home for the evening meal.

The meatless version below is much closer to that eaten by poor Jews who couldn't afford meat; cholent became lethal only with affluence. This makes a lovely, warming dish to serve in the sukkah.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, finely chopped
2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
8 oz. pot barley
6 oz. canned butter beans, drained (other beans can be substituted)
2 tbsp. chopped flat-leaf parsley
2 tbsp. flour, seasoned with 4 grindings of black pepper about 12 oz. old potatoes, unpeeled but thinly sliced about 3½ cups vegetable stock (or a good quality stock cube or bouillon powder dissolved in boiling water)

Preheat oven to 350. Heat the oil in a large flameproof casserole and gently saute the onion and garlic until softened but not brown. Add the barley, beans and parsley.

Sprinkle the seasoned flour over the contents. Layer the potatoes on top and pour over the stock. Cover with a lid or aluminum foil and cook for 50 minutes. Serves 4 to 6.

Health Note: This recipe may help to lower cholesterol, reduce blood pressure and protect your heart and circulatory system.

BRAZILIAN BEAN SALAD

Quinoa is not a grain but the seed from a very distant relative of spinach. Cultivated for more than 5,000 years in South America, it was a staple food of the Incas. It is now increasingly popular in Europe and America.

14 oz. quinoa, well-rinsed and drained
18 oz. french green beans, topped and tailed salt
1 tbsp. pumpkin seeds
1 tbsp. sesame seeds
3 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
juice of 1 lemon

Toast the quinoa in a dry frying pan, stirring continuously for 3 to 4 minutes. Put it into a large saucepan, cover with 1¼ pints cold water, bring to the boil, cover and simmer until translucent, when the germ spirals out of each grain (about 15 minutes), adding extra boiling water if necessary. Drain if necessary and leave to cool.

Boil the beans in lightly salted water until al dente – about 2 minutes. Refresh in cold water and drain. Mix together the quinoa and beans and sprinkle with the pumpkin and sesame seeds. Drizzle with the olive oil. Pour on the lemon juice to taste. Serves 4 to 6.

Health Note: Quinoa is extremely rich in iron and potassium, and also contains B vitamins, zinc and magnesium. Unlike most grains, it provides almost complete protein (as well as being delicious to eat).

A tribute to composers who survived Nazism, the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

German and Jewish composers who were driven into internal and external exile by the Nazis are the subject of a weekend of concerts and lectures at the Royal Conservatory of Music on Oct. 14 and 15.

Music in Exile will be held at the Glenn Gould Studio in the Canadian Broadcasting Centre on Front Street.

The concerts will be performed by the Artists of the Royal Conservatory, a resident ensemble of the conservatory.

Simon Wynberg, the artistic director of the Artists of the Royal Conservatory, said that Music in Exile comes on the heels of a 2003 Music Reborn series that examined the lives and music of Jewish composers and musicians murdered during the Holocaust.

Of Music in Exile, he said, "Many émigré composers, who previously enjoyed the esteem, influence and security of belonging to German and Austrian institutions, faded from view once they left, and much of their music sank into oblivion after their deaths."

Kurt Weill

Yet the composers who survived Nazism and the Holocaust suffered through a second period of discrimination after the war.

The purpose of Music in Exile is to expose them to a new generation of music lovers and restore their reputations.

"We hope that their musical spirit, craftsmanship and ability to engage and entertain make a clear case for the reassessment and more regular inclusion."

The program is divided into four parts.

The first segment, Inner Migration, turns on three anti-Nazi German composers who stayed in Germany during the Third Reich and were persecuted by the regime. They are Karl Amadeus Hartmann (1905-1963), Heinrich Kaminski (1886-1946) and Walter Braunfels (1882-1954).

It also includes the Canadian première of Through Roses, a musical drama featuring Canadian actor Saul Rubinek and eight soloists.

The third program is a showcase for the works of three émigré composers who fled Nazi-occupied Europe and settled in the United States – Alexander Zemlinksy (1871-1942), Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco (1895-1968) and Alexander Tansman (1897-1986) – and one composer, Philipp Jarnach (1892-1982), who exiled himself on a remote island off the German coast.

It is performed by students from the Glenn Gould School and members of the Artists of the Royal Conservatory.

Brett Werb of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum will speak about the 1943 American musical pageant staged by writer Ben Hecht to raise awareness of the mass murder of European Jews by the Nazis.

Lectures are free. Concert tickets are $20 for adults and $10 for seniors and students.

France honours Cinemania founder Teitelbaum

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Maidy Teitelbaum, the woman who has brought French-language films to ever larger anglophone audiences in Montreal, has been recognized by France for her promotion of the arts.

Teitelbaum was decorated as a knight of the Order of Arts and Letters in a ceremony in Paris last month, joining an illustrious worldwide fraternity of distinguished writers and artists of all kinds, and those who have made outstanding contributions in the cultural field.

Maidy Teitelbaum

Teitelbaum is the founder and director of the annual Cinemania film festival, which screens the best of new French feature films with English subtitles. She has almost singlehandedly created a unique niche in Montreal's busy calendar of film festivals.

The great majority of the films are from France, and they run the gamut from dramas and comedies to mysteries and thrillers.

She created the festival in 1995, launching it in the midst of the bitterly divisive referendum campaign on Quebec sovereignty, hoping to do her small part to bridge the language groups. The first edition was five days. This year's runs 11 days, from Nov. 2 to 12, and screens about 25 films.

The ceremony took place at the sumptuous Cercle Interallié, a private club on the rue Faubourg Saint-Honoré, near the Elysée Palace, the official presidential residence. Set on seven acres in the heart of Paris, the Cercle Interallié was once the mansion of the Rothschilds.

Present were her husband Irv, two children and their spouses and two grandsons.

Each year, up to 200 people are nominated to the rank of knight by the French ministry of culture and communication (higher ranks are officer and commander). The presenter was prominent auctioneer Dominique Ribeyre.

Teitelbaum can now wear the order's eight-armed green-enamelled asterisk trimmed in silver and hung on a green-and-white ribbon on special occasions.

Among the other Quebecers who have been named in the past are Céline Dion, Robert Lepage, Michael Tremblay, Gilles Carle and Phyllis Lambert.

"This appointment was completely unexpected," said Teitelbaum, a petite, energetic woman who always wears black. "I'm extremely moved to have received such a high honour, one that has previously been granted to artists I greatly admire. It's an immense pleasure for me to be recognized for work that I am deeply passionate about, inspiring filmgoers to discover and fall in love with francophone cinema. It's equally an award for Cinemania and its team."

Teitelbaum got the idea for Cinemania from a similar festival that used to run in Sarasota, Fla. At the time, no French movies were English-subtitled in Montreal.

She realized there was a bit of a risk of playing into the stereotype of the anglophone who doesn't know enough French to watch a film in that language, but only the odd person has remarked on that, she said.

Her own French, which she said was "acceptable" at the outset, has improved over the years to the point that she describes herself as "pretty fluent," especially when talking about cinema.

Cinemania is moving this year from the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts into the larger and more majestic Imperial Cinema. Last year, 10,000 tickets were sold, the most ever, and many people had to be turned away because the museum's theatre holds only 300, she said. The restored Imperial has 465 seats on the main floor and can expand to 865 when the balcony is used.

The new venue also enhances the convivial "cine-club atmosphere" Teitelbaum has aimed for. There is room to create a little cafe and a well-known purveyor will supply coffee between screenings.

Teitelbaum's criteria are that the selected films be very good and not have been shown here before with English subtitles. Many are Quebec, Canadian and even North American premieres.

Teitelbaum and her small professional staff, headed by managing director Genevieve Royer, a film critic, viewed up to 100 films. Teitelbaum also goes to the Cannes film festival each year and gorges on movies, forgoing the parties.

She and husband Irv, who plays a strong supporting role in Cinemania, discovered a real gem at Cannes last year: Va, Vis et Deviens (Live and Become), the story of an Ethiopian boy airlifted to Israel in 1984, who grew up guarding the secret that he is neither Jewish nor an orphan.

Cinemania survives on its box office, catalogue advertising, assistance from the French consulate and corporate sponsors. It gets very little government funding, which has the advantage of allowing the festival to be independent, she said.

But Cinemania is not only about the films – it's got glitz as well.

Each year, noted actors and directors attend. This year's biggest celebrity announced so far is Juliette Binoche, star of the opening night film Quelques Jours en Septembre. The film's director, Santiago Amigorena, will also attend. The Franco-Italian co-production is described as a satirical spy thriller set in the days before Sept. 11, 2001, in Paris and Venice. Binoche, who plays a secret agent, has appeared in such films as The English Patient and Chocolat.

Others who have come in the past include Racquel Bitton, Emmanuelle Beart and Isabelle Huppert, all big names among francophone cinephiles, and pleasant discoveries for Cinemania's predominantly English-speaking audiences.

The full lineup has not been announced, but a highlight is a retrospective of the French-language films of the great Polish director Krzysztof Kieslowski to commemorate the 10th anniversary of his death.

The Arctic is becoming a tourist destination

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

There are moments in life that are so intense and unique that you want to capture them and keep them bottled as precious memories for the years to come.

I was living such a moment sitting in a small inflatable boat together with 11 travel companions, in the middle of a turquoise ocean, surrounded by thousands of ice chunks sparkling in the Arctic sun like diamonds, and by icebergs, in all possible hues from white to green to deep blue, from opaque to glass-like transparency. As far as the eye could see, it was a painter or photographer's paradise.

We were cruising the High Arctic on a Russian expedition ship, a former Russian research ship, carrying 100 passengers, mostly Canadian, about 40 Russian crew, and an extraordinarily competent expedition crew from Australia and Canada, including explorers, scientists and specialists in Arctic fauna, flora and geology.

This year, the Arctic is one of the hottest (no pun intended) tourist destinations. There are two reasons for this outburst of interest: a historic one and an environmental one. This year is the 100th anniversary of Roald Amundsen's successful voyage through the Northwest Passage and, because of the global warming, both the Arctic's melting glaciers and the potential importance of this future ice-free Northwest Passage are gaining the world's attention.

One of our fellow travellers told me that every Canadian should have a chance to experience the Arctic in their lifetime. I couldn't agree more. The Arctic is like a totally different universe, isolated from civilization, sometimes with no trace of human life for days and days of travel. It is a remote paradise, rarely visited by anyone but the Inuit, stretching from Alaska, through Canada, Greenland and Norway, to Russia.

There are no temples, cathedrals or palaces to tell the history of these peoples, but their millennia-long survival in one of the harshest environments on this planet stands witness to their superlative skills in partnering with nature. Of the many expeditions to find the Northwest Passage or to reach the North Pole, the ones that succeeded tapped into the knowledge and experience of the Inuit.

Qaanaaq, an Inuit village close to the northern tip of Greenland, is the northernmost inhabited community on this planet. Many North Pole expeditions started from here, most notably Robert Peary's, who maintained an Inuit wife and children here. Markers in the picturesque local cemetery recall quite a few Peary last names.

In this colourful and prosperous-looking village nestled between Greenland's icecap and the iceberg-covered Baffin Bay, we met a few friendly people who were fairly conversant in English, beside their native Inuktitut (the language of the Inuit) and the official Danish, among them Aleqatsiaq Peary – the local museum's curator – a descendant of the famous explorer.

The Qaanaaq Inuit have modern conveniences, electricity, health care, schools – all provided by Denmark – but they also hang on to tradition, using husky dog teams rather than snowmobiles when hunting.

We had the privilege to be guests of a Canadian Inuit community, Pond Inlet, at the northern end of Baffin Island. Alerted of our visit, the locals presented a show in their cultural centre, with children dressed in picturesque native costumes singing songs in Inuktitut and performing throat singing, an Inuit tradition. As we walked through the village, we noticed a school, a college, a hotel and a hospital. Dune buggies loaded with children were crisscrossing the streets. The inhabitants were eager to chat with us, and posed smiling for our cameras.

We learned a few words in Inuktitut: we found out that Inuit means "the people," while one person is an Inuk; very useful were qanuipit (hello) and qujannamik (thank you).

The territory of Nunavut was officially created on April 1, 1999. About eight times the size of England, Nunavut – meaning "our land" in Inuktitut – covers three million square kilometres and has a population of 28,000 living in only 23 communities, including the capital Iqaluit.

On this journey, we also encountered remainders of the hardships that were an integral part of Arctic exploration lore. One of our excursions by inflatable boat took us to Beechey Island, a small spit of land off Devon Island in northern Nunavut. On this desolate and barren land, we visited the tombs of some of the members of the ill-fated British expedition of John Franklin who, totally unprepared for the harsh Arctic environment, was seeking the elusive Northwest Passage. Subsequent search expeditions, looking for Franklin survivors, mapped the whole region, opening the way for Amundsen's 1906 successful passage.

With stunning vistas, teeming animal life, a wealth of history, a people of unequalled resilience and resourcefulness, the Arctic is becoming one of the most desirable travel destinations.

The Kolel Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning is planning two educational tours of Israel, led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein.

Israel 101 is a special first-timers' tour (or for those who haven't been back in a long time). Travel dates are Jan. 21 to 31, 2007.

The Exodus Tour takes in Egypt first and then Israel, including a visit to the pyramids and then crossing the border by foot to celebrate Passover with a seder in a desert tent. Travel dates are March 29 to April 11, 2007.

A free information night takes place Oct. 26 at the BJCC, 4588 Bathurst St., the Israel 101 tour at 7:30 p.m., the Exodus Tour at 8:15 p.m. For details, please contact Rabbi Goldstein, 416-636-1880, ext. 472 or www.kolel.org

Shura Ha-Din, the Israeli Law Center, offers the "Ultimate Mission" to Israel, Nov. 6 to 13. Doctors, attorneys, accountants, programmers and other professionals from around the world are expected to participate in this intensive eight-day exploration of Israel's struggle for survival and security after her war against Hezbollah.

The mission includes briefings by Mossad officials, Shin Bet commanders and Israel Defence Forces intelligence officers, an inside tour of the security fence and secret intelligence bases, tours of the Lebanese front-line military positions and the Gaza border check-points, and much more. In short, this is not your usual tourist view of Israel but a highly specialized eye-opener for people who consider themselves knowledgeable about the Middle East.

Soon after the recent conflict on Israel's northern border, the city of Haifa bounced back to "business as usual" and is again buzzing with visitors, Israel's Ministry of Tourism reports.

Chief among Haifa attractions is the splendid and immaculate Baha'i Gardens, consisting of 18 monumental terraces that soar 750 feet high. Intricately planted and decorated with flowers, topiaries, sweeping lawns, manicured cypress trees and stone peacocks and eagles, the terraces are all connected by creamy stone staircases and gurgling water channels, and dotted with ornamental fountains.

Half-way up the Carmel slope, the golden-tiled dome of the Shrine of the Báb has long been Haifa's most instantly recognizable landmark. The golden shrine houses the grave of Siyyid Ali-Muhammad, the "martyr-herald" of the Baha'i faith.

Haifa's many other attractions include the Technion (Israel's MIT) set on a 300-acre campus, the National Maritime Museum, the Mané Katz Museum, the Tikotin Museum of Japanese Art, the Museum of Clandestine Immigration, the Haifa Zoo, the Carmelite Monastery and Stella Maris Lighthouse, and Elijah's Cave. Noah Richler paints a literary portrait of Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For journalist Noah Richler, the topic was a natural fit. "I fell back on what I knew best – writers," he said. "I had grown up in a family of writers, had worked with novelists and then had written about them for a lot of my working life."

Richler was talking about his new book, This Is My Country, What's Yours? A Literary Atlas of Canada, which was published by McClelland & Stewart last month.

A cultural portrait of contemporary Canada as seen through the prism of some of its most celebrated novelists, short story writers and storytellers, Richler's book is based on the supposition that fiction is the surest way to plumb the depths of a country as culturally and ethnically diverse as ours.

Richler, the first books editor of the National Post and a former British Broadcasting Corporation producer, spent two years travelling around Canada gathering data, during the course of which he interviewed some 100 authors.

They form something of a who's who of Canadian literature and include luminaries like Margaret Atwood, David Bezmozgis, Austin Clarke, Barbara Gowdy, Ann-Marie McDonald, Rohinton Mistry, Alice Munro, Michael Ondaatje, Carol Shields and Jane Urquhart.

Akin to a literary travelogue, and a homage to Canadian writing, Richler's 476-page opus has garnered enviable reviews. As the Globe and Mail reviewer gushed,"The book is quite simply wonderful, exquisitely structured and fabulously written."

Richler, whose late father, Mordecai, was both an icon and gadfly of Canlit, approached the topic from a highly personal point of view.

"Inevitably, the choice of authors in a venture like this is going to be subjective. There is a top tier of Canadian authors, read not just here but all over the world, that one cannot in good faith ignore. There are others who wrote specific books or whose frame of mind was interesting to me.

"And there are others whom I would have liked to interview but found no reason to, and others I just did not get to because there comes a time in the creative undertaking when the mind moves on and says, 'Okay, enough research time, time to do some writing now.'"

Richler, who has been promoting his book on a Canada-wide tour, first sold the idea to Doug Gibson, then the president of McClelland & Stewart, in the spring of 2002, less than a year after his father died.

"I had written about 60,000 words of a novel in the months preceding his death, but after he passed away, the humour went out of me – the humour for a novel, at least."

Eager "to propel himself out of grief," Richler also sold the concept to Adrian Mills, then the vice-president of English language radio at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. A Literary Atlas of Canada became a 10-part series on Ideas, and was broadcast again recently.

Richler was encouraged to pursue the project by none other than Atwood, the author of a 1972 book titled Survival: A Thematic Guide to Canadian Literature.

"We were having lunch after the publication of her novel, Oryx and Crake, and she remarked that books like Survival have their moment on the stage, and that now, some 30 years later, it was time for another fresh look at the very different situation of stories in Canada. That's what I believed, certainly."

Asked if he likes any particular writer in This Is My Country, he said, "This is not the point of the book. It is not and was never meant to be a list of whom to read. I had many moving experiences as I gathered the material, but these memories are entwined around my admiration for what all writers do."

In general, the stylistic dimensions of a novel are of most interest to Richler. "I believe that the moral lessons of novels are mostly familiar, and as I am in agreement with them – lessons about our common humanity, our courage in the face of adverse circumstances and so on – what is interesting to me and most people who read fiction is the language and style of a writer, and the picture a novel may paint of a place or time that is not my own."

He never feels obliged to a book he is reading. "If it is not compelling, I drop it. And frankly, I think that a lot more novels would be read if readers didn't feel guilty about not finishing novels that do not hold them. We have a gamut of novels for all tastes. Let's enjoy them."

Born in Montreal and raised in London, England, Richler returned to Montreal for a year in 1968 when his father accepted a teaching position at Concordia University, known then as Sir George Williams University.

"We came back in 1972 and stayed," he said. "I went to high school in Montreal, travelled for a while and then studied classics and archeology at McGill."

During his travels in Canada, he was a prospector in the Yukon, a member of an oil exploration crew and the manager of a theatre company.

"It was very easy to get a job, and I would arrange my exams and choose my courses so that I could be the first one to leave Montreal for Calgary or wherever I was going. It was very easy to make a pile of money and to see the country, and I made a point of doing both these things."

He added, "The gift of Canada as a teenager, young man and even the middle-aged one I am now is that it is a nation of extraordinary variety, and rawness, in which it is possible to pitch in and participate."

Richler has also visited Israel several times and was once a volunteer on a kibbutz in the Negev. Now he wants to learn to read and write Hebrew.

After returning to Britain yet again, Richler studied politics and economics at Oxford University, produced features and documentaries for the BBC, including a series titled Young Israelis, and wrote for publications such as the Guardian, Punch, Granta and the Daily Telegraph.

In 1998, he found himself back in Canada once more. "I missed my brothers [Daniel and Jacob] who had remained here, and the Canada I knew so well through work. And I missed my father, whose influence on me was huge. So I came home, and when the National Post telephoned me, that was my opportunity."

Richler had been at the National Post for two years when the publisher, Conrad Black, took a dislike to him. "He was not used to employees who were not sycophants. I was removed as books editor, but Ken Whyte, then the editor, made me the literary columnist, and I enjoyed that. But Matthew Fraser, the subsequent editor-in-chief, was insufferable and uninteresting and an egoist, and so I quit."

Since then, Richler has also hosted CBC's Richler on Radio and contributed political travel pieces and literary articles to Maclean's, The Walrus and the Globe and Mail, among other publications.

Currently, he is finishing an essay on the Ontario landscape painter John Hartman, whom he describes as "a very talented and special artist."

He and his wife, Sarah, a publishing house president, and their two children, Sophie and Nathalie, divide their time between Toronto and Digby Neck in southern Nova Scotia.

"It's an exceptionally beautiful part of the country," he said, "and the house is a wonderful place to work."

Breakthrough in diabetes prevention reported

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A McMaster University medical researcher is the co-principal investigator of a major new study that suggests drug therapy can curb Type 2 diabetes.

Hertzel Gerstein, a professor in both the departments of medicine and clinical epidemiology and biostatistics, presented his findings in the latest edition of The Lancet, the British medical journal, and at a meeting of the European Association for the Study of Diabetes in Copenhagen last month.

In the study, some 5,000 people in 21 countries at risk of contracting Type 2 diabetes, which generally develops in adulthood, took the drugs ramipril or rosiglitazone for three years.

"The trials showed that a drug used and approved to treat diabetes, rosiglitazone – which is sold under the brand name Avandia – can also prevent or delay diabetes when given to people at high risk of future diabetes," Gerstein said in an interview.

Gerstein, who was born and raised in Toronto and now lives in Hamilton, said Avandia is not the only anti-diabetes drug available today.

But in the study, individuals who took Avandia, which is marketed in Canada by GSK, reduced their chances of contracting diabetes by two-thirds.

Asked whether drug therapy through Avandia is a magic bullet, Gerstein said, "There is no quick fix."

People at risk should consult their doctors and be aware that Type 2 diabetes affects those with a strong family history, those who are overweight and those who have problems with glucose absorption during pregnancy.

Dr. Hertzel Gerstein

He said potential sufferers of Type 2 diabetes should increase their physical activity – to about 30 minutes per day – and try to lose weight, especially around the abdomen.

"If that is not sufficient, then drugs may be considered in consultation with a physician."

Gerstein said that Avandia, while having been approved for treating diabetes in Canada, has not been approved as yet for diabetes prevention.

He estimates that two million Canadians have Type 2 diabetes, and even more are at risk of getting it.

Diabetes is a burden on the economy. As Gerstein put it, "The Canadian Diabetes Association estimates that diabetes costs Canadian taxpayers more than $12 billion per year."

Suggesting that diabetes has morphed into a global epidemic, Gerstein warned, "Diabetes is a common chronic disease that is rapidly increasing. People with diabetes are at high risk for future health problems.

"We are now identifying a growing set of approaches to reduce or prevent the risk of diabetes. This includes dietary and lifestyle approaches. But the clear results of our medical trials mean that there is now another proven approach that can be added to this growing list."

Kimel family donates new MRI to Toronto hospitals

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A new system of magnetic resonance imaging, a gift from Toronto's Kimel family, is being tested as a treatment for bone metastases, cancer that has spread to the bone from other parts of the body, when other pain relief methods have failed.

Bone is the third most common organ to which cancer spreads, after the lungs and liver. In cases of breast cancer, bone is the second most common place that cancer spreads to.

A patient in Toronto, with lymphoma and prostate cancer that had spread to his bones, was able to stop taking all pain medication after a three-hour MRI treatment.

Similar studies are taking place at Sheba Medical Center in Tel HaShomer, Israel, St. Luc Hospital in Montreal, Charité Hospital in Berlin and between 30 and 40 other sites around the world. To date, 15 patients have been treated with the same positive results as in Toronto.

Dr. David Gianfelice, associate professor, abdominal/interventioning radiology at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University Health Network, is leading the research here. He said pain from bone metastases is the most common cause of cancer pain. Current treatment options, which include analgesics, chemotherapy, hormonal therapy, radiation, surgery and radio frequency ablation, have significant side effects, he noted, and also these treatments are not always effective.

Magnetic-resonance-guided focused ultrasound (MRgFUS) uses the ExAblate 2000 computer system to work. The MRI machine accurately visualizes the cancer and aims focused ultrasound waves at the tumour to destroy it. With this procedure, the physician can continuously monitor and then adjust the treatment, so that only the cancer – and none of the adjacent tissue – is affected.

The patient can even return home the same day, and there are no side effects. Gianfelice said the MRgFUS has been used in Montreal since 1998 for breast cancer, and has been approved by the FDA for use with uterine fibroids in the United States.

Warren Kimel said his father, Manny, who was in the textile industry, was surprised that Mount Sinai Hospital didn't have an MRI machine, especially since he was told that the CAT scan machines were old and not too efficient. "He was pleased that he could help bring the hospital into the modern age."

Because of the high cost of the MRI machine, his father couldn't provide it without help from his children, Kimel said. It took five to six years to purchase the technology.

Radiology services are now provided jointly by Mount Sinai hospital and the University Hospital, Toronto General Hospital site, but the equipment is at TGH.

A novel from the early days of Canadian Jewish literature

The Rich Man* by Henry Kreisel, McClelland & Stewart.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Although a good deal of ink has been spilled in pursuit of the great American novel, Canadians are less confident about such discussions.

Musings in pursuit of the great Canadian Jewish novel are that much scarcer, though we might point to Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz as the most read, Leonard Cohen's Beautiful Losers as the most audacious, A.M. Klein's The Second Scroll as the most learned, and Adele Wiseman's Crackpot as the closest thing in the tradition to a full-fledged feminist novel.

Norman Ravvin

But Henry Kreisel's The Rich Man may be the most undeservedly neglected. Published in 1948 by McClelland & Stewart in Toronto, it predates all of the above (Klein's book is nearest to it in age, having appeared in 1951 from Knopf in the United States). The appearance of Kreisel's debut novel marked the first appearance of a Jewish-themed novel by a Jewish author from a mainstream Canadian publishing house.

Kreisel became a Canadian writer in a challenging and indirect way. Born in Austria, he fled the Anschluss for England with his family. There, he was interned as an "enemy alien" as part of the British government's hapless effort to show attentiveness to a would-be fifth column on the home front.

With his father, Kreisel was sent to Canada, where he spent more than a year in Allied-run internment camps in the New Brunswick woods. Though the elder Kreisel returned to England to be reunited with his wife, Henry Kreisel was determined to become an English-language Canadian writer and managed to meet a well-off Jewish patron who sponsored him upon his release.

In one of those remarkable transformations that newcomers to this country continue to undergo, Kreisel excelled at Toronto's Harbord Collegiate and went on to English studies at the University of Toronto. By the time he was seeing The Rich Man through the press, he was teaching at the University of Alberta, where he would remain for the rest of a fruitful academic career.

The Rich Man deserves to be seen as the inaugural book in a trend that now characterizes a good deal of our writing: a literate newcomer from a vastly different cultural background brings a keen outsider's eye to the challenge of mining the peculiarities of Canadian social and cultural life.

The Rich Man opens in 1935 with a singular portrait of Jewish immigrant existence in Toronto's garment district. Its exemplar of that time and place is Jacob Grossman, who has worked for decades as a presser in a Spadina-area sweatshop. With his children grown, his wife dead, and a few hundred dollars saved, Grossman decides to return to visit the family he left behind in Vienna. With this narrative turn, Kreisel sends his readers on an investigation of prewar Jewish Europe that was little-recorded in English-language fiction. Kreisel, with his fresh Canadian sensitivities alongside a storehouse of European knowledge and language (including German and Yiddish) had the tools to develop his characters' inner lives. Like Kreisel's own life, The Rich Man straddles a variety of languages, cultures and geographies.

Aspects of Kreisel's approach strike the reader as particularly modern for their time. His prose is lean and straightforward. Much of his novel's action is motivated by dialogue, and his set pieces evoke mood economically. The two young Canadian writers of the late 1940s who worked in a similar vein are Norman Levine and Mavis Gallant. Like them, Kreisel is uninterested in melodrama or romantic, lyrical writing for its own sake. His fictional tableau, when it reflects the predicaments of its time, is ironic in the subtlest ways. Though he (and we) know the disaster that will befall Europe within five years, he is unwilling to treat his characters as history's dupes.

The Rich Man is not written as if the Holocaust was predetermined, nor does it present Jewish life before the war as a kind of desperate mistake. In fact, it is the Canadian Jacob Grossman – a free man with the right passport in his jacket pocket – who finds himself trapped in circumstances of his own making.

The Rich Man has been out of print for a number of years, and Kreisel is not well-remembered outside the city of Edmonton, where he laboured in a wide community of writers and scholarly colleagues. His novel's reappearance allows us to broaden our perspective on Canadian Jewish literature. At the same time, it returns an early Spadina to our literary life and marks the beginning, in English, of an immigrant literature in Canada.

Norman Ravvin chairs the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the novel Lola by Night and the essay collection Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue.

based on a true story

The week-long festival of Sukkot (also pronounced Sukkos), comes shortly after Yom Kippur. There are two major mitzvot of Sukkot. The first is to "dwell in a sukkah" — i.e., eat one's meals and spend time in a temporary structure with a roof of leaves. The second is to hold the "four species" together: lulav (palm branch), etrog (citron, a fragrant citrus fruit), hadas (willow branches), and aravot (myrtle branches). The four species represent all the different kinds of Jews in the world coming together as one.

The forests surrounding the small town of Berditchev were ablaze with the vibrant hues of autumn. Sukkot was in the air, and the people of Berditchev wasted no time preparing. A cacophony of sawing and hammering filled the busy streets, as makeshift sukkahs sprang up everywhere. The joy was palpable. Only one thing was missing.

"How can we do the mitzvah of lulav without an etrog?" sighed Rabbi Levi Yitzchok, the Rebbe of Berditchev, for the umpteenth time.

His Chassidim nodded, dumbly. There was not an etrog to be found in the entire city.

The Rebbe sent messengers everywhere, inquiring after an etrog, but there were none to found. Until…

"Rebbe!" came an exultant cry." We found an etrog!"

"What? Where?"

"It belongs to Yankel, a merchant passing through town. And it's such a beautiful etrog, too!

"So what are you waiting for? Buy it, quickly!"

Everyone waited anxiously.

Over an hour passed.

Finally the messenger returned, emptyhanded.

"He's not taking money for it. No matter what we offer, he just insists that he's bringing this etrog home with him to his family. And he lives in Tarnopol, three days away. There's no way this etrog's going to be in Berditchev this Sukkot, he says."

The Rebbe was crestfallen.

"Please ask him to come to me," he finally said.

Yankel the merchant entered the Rebbe's humble dwelling, surrounded by throngs of Chassidim who had congregated to see what would happen.

"Reb Yankel," entreated the Rebbe, "if you agree to sell me your etrog, you will be able to use it too. I'm buying it for the whole city to use. Please, do not deprive us of this important mitzvah."

"Well in that case," offered the Rebbe, "what do you say to this? I'll buy the etrog in exchange for the heavenly reward I will get from doing the mitzvah with it."

Whoa, thought Yankel. Everyone knows what a tzaddik Reb Levi Yitzchok is. The reward in heaven for even just one of his mitzvot is really something special. After a moment of contemplation, he announced, "It's a deal!"

The Rebbe and the Chassidim rejoiced, and after sending a message to his family, Yankel made arrangements to stay in Berditchev for the holiday.

Sukkot night, all of Berditchev gathered in the synagogue for holiday prayers. When the service finished, everyone wished Reb Levi Yitzchok a Gut Yom Tov before returning to their homes. Yankel followed his host home, anticipating a festive holiday meal, but when they reached the sukkah his host said, "We don't have room for you tonight."

"What?" demanded Yankel.

"I'm sorry. "See if you can eat somewhere else."

Stunned and offended, Yankel went the neighbours' sukkah, but received the same response: "We don't have room for you."

He tried the next sukkah. No luck there, either.

It was getting late. Yankel trudged from sukkah to sukkah, his stomach growling, but nobody took him in.

He knocked on the door of another sukkah. They were already eating dessert, but he was desperate.

"Excuse me, could I possibly join you…"

"Sorry, no room."

Yankel finally lost it.

"Do you know who I am?" he demanded furiously. "Because of me, you're going to be able to do the mitzvah of lulav and etrog tomorrow. I'm the one who sold it to your Rebbe!"

"Exactly," replied the man, cryptically.

"You mean… you don't mean…" gasped Yankel.

Three minutes later, he was pounding on the door to Reb Levi Yitzchok's sukkah.

The door swung open. The sukkah was illuminated by the bright festival candles. Colourful decorations festooned the walls. The scent of the fresh pine needles above mixed with the tempting aroma of the waiting holiday food. The Rebbe stood by the table, lost in a spiritual reverie. The sight was awe-inspiring.

But Yankel was too livid to be awe-inspired.

"What's the big idea? You're upset that I bought your heavenly reward so you have the whole city lock me out like this? Don't you know it's a mitzvah to eat in the sukkah tonight?

"Of course," replied the Rebbe, "and you are quite welcome to join my family for the holiday meal – if you agree to sell me back the heavenly reward I sold you, that is."

Yankel paled. Give it up? And be stuck here in Berditchev away from my family for nothing? On the other hand, it's a mitzvah to eat in the sukkah tonight. Lost in thought, he deliberated. He knew what he had to do.

"It's a deal," he muttered.

The Rebbe beamed. "You see," he explained, "after I bought the etrog, I realized something. Not everyone deserves heavenly reward. Who knows if you are worthy of receiving it?

"But now I see that you are willing to give up that which was so precious to you. Willing to give it up just so that you could do a mitzvah. Indeed, you deserve the heavenly reward you have bought. You have earned it. Welcome. It is our pleasure to have you join us in our sukkah for tonight."

Observant hockey player on fast track to NHL

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Benjamin Rubin has the combination of speed, size and mean wrist shot that any hockey coach looks for.

But perhaps only a former superstar like Patrick Roy would accept the condition that 17-year-old Rubin has insisted on throughout his rise through the sport's ranks: he will not play or practise on Shabbat or the Jewish holidays.

Roy has given a big break to Rubin, who comes from an Orthodox Montreal family, in making him a member of the Quebec City Remparts, the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League team, which he co-owns, manages and coaches.

It means that the 6-foot-1, 185-pound left-winger will play only about half of the 70 regular season games. He also won't be eating with the team; he brings his own kosher food.

The QMJHL is part of the Canadian Hockey League, historically a fast track to the NHL for players under age 20. The Remparts are one of the best teams, winners of last season's Memorial Cup, junior hockey's most coveted trophy.

Rubin is guarded about his ambitions. "It's everyone's dream to play in the NHL, but right now I just want to play and see how it goes."

Rubin, who graduated in June from Hebrew Academy, where he was an outstanding basketball player, has jumped to the QMJHL from the Midget AA Montreal Maroons.

Rubin was not drafted: he is what is known as a walk-on. Two people who saw Rubin's potential persuaded Roy, former goalie for the Montreal Canadiens and Colorado Avalanche, to give the lad a tryout at camp. They were Johnny Esposito, father of the Remparts' star centre Angelo, a friend and teammate of Rubin's up through the ranks, and car dealer Sam Eltes, well-connected in the sports scene, who in his youth was a promising athlete and is observant himself.

Montrealer Alan Maislin, president of the Israeli Ice Hockey Federation, said Rubin impressed former Canadiens coach and Israeli national team coach Jean Perron at the federation's hockey school in Metullah last summer. "He said this kid has the tools to go all the way. He's big, he plays mean, but he's also got 'the head,' the right mental attitude that it takes."

Maislin thinks Roy deserves a lot of credit for accommodating a Jew who is shomer Shabbat, a concession that is probably without precedent in any team sport at this level. "Roy is making a major sacrifice… This means Rubin must be a special player."

And the fact that this is happening in French Canada cannot be ignored, Maislin feels. "Benjamin is getting wonderful press in the French media. This is great for the Jewish community."

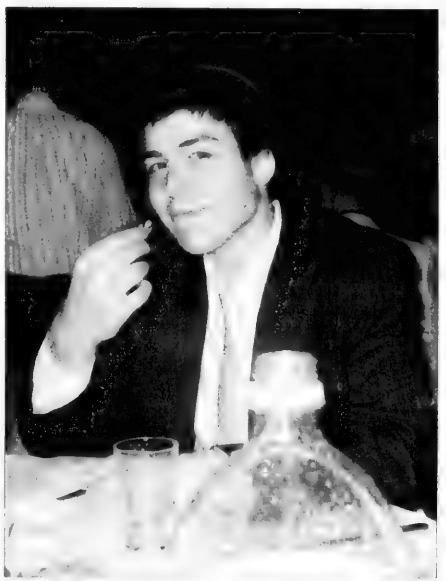
Rubin is the second of the four sons of Maggy and Michael Rubin, both architects who specialize in synagogues, and grew up in Snowdon. His father, a serious hockey fan, realized Benjamin had extraordinary ice skills when he first got him on skates at age 3. Benjamin started playing prenovice hockey at 4½.

He has encouraged Benjamin to go as far as he can in hockey. While not wanting to make any assumptions, the elder Rubin admits he's already pored over the NHL schedule to see how many games are played on Shabbat, and come to the conclusion that is "conceivable if not probable" that an observant Jew, who is a valuable enough player, could be drafted.

The reason Benjamin skipped Midget AAA is that officials balked at letting him keep to his restricted schedule, his father said. He's deeply grateful to Roy for showing "rare courage," but does not think he is doing Benjamin a favour. "Roy recognizes that Benjamin is so good that it's better to have him part-time than not at all."

Rubin is hoping that when Benjamin becomes an adult, he will continue to put his religious convictions ahead of ambition. "I would be hurt if he doesn't, but I won't disown him."

Rubin has given much thought to whether he has steered his son in the right direction. "Some have told me it's a dead end, not for an Orthodox boy. Others that I should not suppress a God-given talent."



Benjamin Rubin

Rubin's two younger sons, Elan, 15, and David, 12, are also playing organized hockey and show promise.

Since coming to training camp in August, Benjamin has been living with Quebec City's only rabbi, Dovid Lewin, the spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Israel Ohev Shalom, and his wife, Devorah, who is expecting their first child. The Jewish community is very small; the congregation has 90 members.

Rabbi Lewin, a Lubavitcher who arrived from France five months ago, says he didn't know anything about hockey before but has come to appreciate the game from watching Rubin play.

When the rabbi showed up at the Colisée Pepsi, the Remparts' home arena, for an exhibition game against the Chicoutimi Saguenéens, people came up to him to ask if he was "Monsieur Rubin."

Rubin instantly became a curiosity in the local media, with stories focusing on his adherence to Orthodox Judaism and Roy's concession. "Quebec people don't know anything about Judaism," Rabbi Lewin said. "They see someone with a beard and black hat and they think I must be his father."

The rabbi has become something of an armchair coach already. "I think Patrick Roy is a very smart guy. He understood how good a player Benjamin is, and made a compromise."

Rubin, who studies social sciences at Champlain-St. Lawrence, an English-language CEGEP, is a little overwhelmed by all the attention. "Everyone asks me about what kosher means, what the religion is about, don't I feel bad about missing games. But they are very accepting. And the league has been really, really helpful."

Rubin speaks French well, having spoken it with his mother, who is of Moroccan origin and not as hockey-mad as her men.

At time of writing, Rubin – No. 15 – had already racked up points in two exhibition games against the Chicoutimi Saguenéens, scoring a goal in the first, and getting an assist in the second.

Star reporter promotes high school athletes

By Eli Shupak
Special to The CJN

David Grossman didn't have it easy growing up in the west end of Toronto, but with his determination and will to succeed, he forged a career in journalism that has spanned more than a quarter-century with Canada's largest newspaper.

Grossman, the Toronto Star's high school sports reporter since 1980, grew up on Queen Street and recalls the days when he would come home with broken glasses and bleeding noses as the target of anti-Semitic slurs. It was far from a typical Jewish upbringing for a kid in Parkdale in the late 1950s whose friends were predominantly living in North York and Forest Hill.

"What I'll always remember from my mother was to work hard, set your goals, treat people the way you want them to treat you, and always strive forward," said Grossman, 55. "No doubt, if it wasn't for her, there is no way I'd be where I am today."

While he wasn't the best when it came to academics, Grossman – who attended Hebrew school twice a week, commuting by two streetcars and a bus – was hooked on sports.

But he knew there was no way he was going to be a professional athlete, so he figured the next best thing was to write about athletes and talk about them.

In addition to writing for the Star, Grossman has hosted a high school sports talk show Sunday mornings on the Fan 590 Radio for the past 15 years. It is the only radio show of its kind in the country.

Back in his days at Parkdale Collegiate, the Globe and Mail would pay him 50 cents to call in a score. He would get home from Hebrew school, make half a dozen phone calls to coaches, report the scores to the paper, and within an hour have everything accomplished. He would then turn his attention to his homework.

"It was quite pleasant when the cheques started coming in the mail," recalled Grossman, who shortly thereafter began reporting scores to the Toronto Star, as well as to the old Toronto Telegram. "When the games started to pile up, so did the money. Fifty cents was a lot of money back then."

Later, a summer job became available with the Globe. With his foot in the door as a copy boy, Grossman got to fill in for someone and cover a high school soccer game.

It was memorable, not only because it was the first time he had his name in the paper, but because the game's only goal came as a result of a player kicking the ball in the air and the wind blowing it back into the net.

From there, Grossman decided he wanted to go to Humber College's journalism program. He maintained his links with the newspapers, as well as radio and TV stations while pursuing his diploma.

Shortly after graduating, he received a full-time job offer, the first of his life. Humber was looking for an information officer and they had found their man. Grossman did the job for a month or two before being appointed director of college relations.

After four years at Humber, Grossman became a civil servant, wearing a jacket and tie during the day while working with the provincial government, then putting on a pair of jeans and becoming a reporter for the Star.

He worked for the province for 24 years in a number of jobs, including his last one as director of communications with the parole board, prior to taking a pension and leaving in 2004.

During his time with government, Grossman was involved in writing the provincial freedom of information and protection of privacy act. He also worked on a number of other special projects and received letters from three different premiers of three different parties in appreciation of his work.

Since he started writing for the Star in 1980, the award-winning reporter has penned more than 10,000 stories on high school sports, and while the opportunity to cover professional sport has presented itself, Grossman has insisted on working with teens.

"I have been able to help hundreds and thousands of kids get recognized, and that makes me feel good," he said. "I felt that somewhere down the line, someone gave me a break and I'd like to give the kids a break – give them back what someone gave me."

David Grossman

While he said that working 16-hour days over two decades was very demanding, he enjoyed the jobs he did with the different ministries and has yet to miss a day at the Star for health reasons.

Grossman said his ability to manage time effectively is the reason he has never missed a deadline.

"It always seemed to work out, even when I had my doubts," said Grossman, who was often referred to as a magician for the way he was able to juggle his responsibilities.

"It was difficult working on an assignment that required a communication plan, a speech, and maybe a news release for a cabinet minister and there's an important football game to get to."

While Grossman was establishing himself in the working world in the early 1980s, tragedy struck when he was in Ottawa on assignment for the government. During a fire in his house, his three-year-old son Mark suffered burns and died three months later.

"That's something you never forget," said Grossman, who now lives in Thornhill. "It's always in the back of my mind, seven days a week.

"That's something that could change the lives of people very easily. I've had to work very hard with the support of a lot of people and a wonderful family who knew, respected, and gave me the devotion and love to continue doing this."

His wife, Carol, is an elementary school teacher, and their daughter, Marissa, is following in her footsteps, currently working toward her master's degree. The couple also have a son, Ari, a sports information co-ordinator at Wilfrid Laurier University in Waterloo, Ont., and another daughter, Yonit, who is in her last year of high school.

Last year, Grossman was appointed to the board of Maccabi Canada as communications co-ordinator, a position that hadn't existed in the past. He went to the Maccabiah Games in Israel last year and was proud to promote Jewish athletes as they competed in the world's third-largest amateur sporting event.

He plans to return to the next Games in 2009 with his family in tow.

"Now that I've gotten up in years, I feel bad that I didn't spend more time with the kids when they were younger," he said. "There was time with them, but not enough. Maybe that'll be a chance for my wife to meet me, and my kids to spend time with me."

POMEGRANATE CHICKEN WINGS

3 lbs. chicken wings
1/2 tsp oil
2 tsp minced garlic
1 c pomegranate juice
1 c cranberry juice
1/3 c sugar
2 tblsp cider vinegar
3 tblsps pomegranate seeds

Rinse wings, drain and cut apart at the joints. Salt to taste. Place in a single layer in a large nonstick pan. Bake in a 400°F oven until brown and crisp, about 45 min. turning pieces occasionally.

In a medium nonstick pan, over high heat, stir oil and garlic for 2 to 3 min. Add pomegranate juice, cranberry juice, sugar, and vinegar. Stir until sugar dissolves, bring to boil; boil about 15 min. Drain and discard fat from chicken wings. Pour pomegranate sauce over wings and turn pieces. Bake until sauce thickens and sticks to wings, about 12 minutes, turning often.

BEAUTIFYING KIRYAT SHMONAH: Some 70 local high school students joined in the effort to create an art forest in the park in Kiryat Shmonah, Israel. The undertaking was the initiative of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, and the young artists displayed their talents under the guidance of artists and art students of the youth wing of the Israel Museum. The town in the Upper Galilee panhandle was hit by constant barrages of Katyusha rockets during the recent war with Hezbollah. [Israel Museum photos]

Tree of life

By SUSAN ROTH

A couple of months have passed since we returned from Israel. We arrived home safely on July 14 after a traumatic and mind-altering experience.

We were ending a two-week stay in Safed, where we were visiting our son, daughter-in-law and grandson, when the unthinkable happened. While sitting in our son Jay's home in the afternoon of July 13, all of a sudden, we heard a massive explosion that was very close by. I was on the phone with a friend at the time and she just screamed, as the explosion was even closer to her.

We all knew that something dreadful had happened, and we decided to take shelter in the basement. We flipped through radio stations to try to find out what was going on. Then, moments later there was another explosion. At that point, luckily, our son Jay's friend, Yaacov, came over and suggested that we all take cover in his "safe house." It was a welcome invitation.

We grabbed a few baby items and some food and started running up the street when a siren started blasting. At that point, we ran into someone's open door and took shelter in a walk-in cupboard. Oddly enough, a young woman from Toronto whom we had never met before was also taking cover there.

After our brief stay in the cupboard, we felt we needed to move on to a safer environment. We gathered our courage and our few belongings and ran to the "safe house," a two-room underground apartment in a 600-year-old building that had windows on the front of the building only, making it more resistant to the impact of Katyusha rockets.

There were about 20 of us staying in this two-room apartment. We could hear explosions at random intervals. It was hard to assess where they were falling and the constant barrage was terrifying, to say the least. We tried to talk in order to take our minds off the situation. Then, at about 9 p.m., we heard and felt the most horrific, panic-inducing explosion. It was obvious that this one had fallen very close by. The whole apartment shook, dust was flying, and we were all shaking and terrified.

Later that night, we found out that a Katyusha had fallen about 10 feet from the wall we were sitting in front of. The next day, we learned that we had a very special tree to thank for our survival. A rocket had fallen in the garden behind the house we were in, but its path had been blocked by a large overgrown cedar tree. If that tree hadn't been there, the Katyusha would have hit the wall near where we were sitting.

It's interesting to note that the people in the apartment building next door had petitioned the municipality for two years to remove the tree because it obscured their view. Thankfully, their request was denied. That overgrown tree actually became our "tree of life."

It's ironic that some people in Safed took this overgrown, unsightly tree to be a nuisance. There's an interesting analogy to be drawn. We are told that in Bereshit, Adam chose to eat from the "Tree of Knowledge" because its fruit was visible and external, whereas the "Tree of Life" had only bark, which did not look enticing to him. Who knows? Maybe it, too, was ugly and overgrown, like our own tree of life.

There are many stories of miracles that happened during the war. For those who don't believe in miracles, our story may not impress them. But sometimes, unusual experiences force us to look at life in a different way.

I truly believe that this war has made many Israelis approach life differently. There's no turning back when you've been exposed to the unthinkable: a threat to your very existence.

A friend of mine from Safed, who fled northern Israel with her family during the war, e-mailed me the following remarks: "The war has changed life for us in some ways. Most people I meet admit to feeling different inside. Hard to say what, but for me there is a sense of vulnerability, a real fear for the safety of Israel, which I never felt before, but when you are forced to flee your home the existential threat that has always existed becomes much more tangible and frightening. With that, though, comes a greater appreciation for our life in this incredibly special, holy and beautiful land – a deep cherishing of the now and a resolution to enjoy as much as I can in every moment that I am blessed with here."

Let's hope and pray that the beauty of Safed – with its ancient synagogues, winding streets and gorgeous vegetation – will be restored to its prewar glory as soon as possible. And let's also hope and pray that the people of Israel will regain their strength and overcome their feelings of fear and vulnerability.

Israeli troops leave Lebanon

By DAN BARON
JTA

ISRAEL-LEBANON BORDER — Israel's war with Hezbollah ended much the way it was waged – unpredictably, and with a good deal of self-doubt.

"It's over, Mom," one soldier muttered into his cellphone as he crossed back from Lebanese territory at the Israeli border village of Zarit before dawn Oct. 1.

The lack of fanfare was a departure from Israel's last Lebanon withdrawal, in 2000, and its 2005 pullout from the Gaza Strip.

Back then, journalists were encouraged to turn out en masse for the departing tanks and troops and the locking of border fences. This time around, the manoeuvres seemed almost furtive.

UNIFIL empowered to use force against Hezbollah

"Our priority is security for our forces, of course, but I won't deny that no one felt a great need to trumpet this withdrawal," one Israeli source said.

"There is a sense that the war began and ended, somehow, out of our control."

The observation appeared to be confirmed by the afternoon of Oct. 1, when the United Nations announced – contrary to Israeli declarations – that the withdrawal was not quite complete. Some soldiers remained in the northern half of Ghajar, a village bisected by the Israeli-Lebanese border but whose residents claim allegiance to neighbouring Syria.

"I expect that they will leave this area in the course of the week, thus completing the withdrawal in line with Resolution 1701," said Maj.-Gen. Alain Pellegrini, commander of the UNIFIL peacekeeper force in southern Lebanon.

He was referring to the UN Security Council resolution of Aug. 14, which halted Israel's month-long war with Hezbollah on the promise that peacekeepers and Lebanese troops would take over and police the Iranian-backed militia's former strongholds.

Israel later confirmed that it had not left the Lebanese half of Ghajar. Israeli officials said they would leave Ghajar once security arrangements are complete.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert gave the order last Thursday for the IDF to remove a fence it installed on the Lebanese side of Ghajar because it was not built in coordination with UNIFIL and not authorized by the security cabinet. Israel Radio reported that the government planned to put up a new fence in the area to keep Hizbullah at bay.

On Oct. 2, a Hezbollah leader said violence could resume if Israel did not leave Ghajar and Shebaa Farms, a portion of the Golan

The News in Brief

CANADA

Interfaith Unions Up

OTTAWA — The percentage of Jews in interfaith unions rose from nine per cent in 1981 to 17 per cent 20 years later, a higher rate of increase than for the country as a whole, a new Statistics Canada report shows. The study, released last week, said the national rate increased from 15 to 19 per cent. It also showed the percentage of Catholics in such conjugal unions increased from 12 to 16 per cent, and from 14 to 21 per cent among Protestants. The rate among Muslims, Hindus and Sikhs dropped over the same period, because many arrived between 1991 and 2001 and they retained strong ties to marital customs of their homelands, StatsCan said.

Gift Funds Exchange

WATERLOO, Ont. — A $500,000 gift from high-powered business couple Gerald Schwartz, CEO of Onex Corp., and Heather Reisman, head of Indigo Books and Music, will establish a new academic and research exchange program in computer science between the University of Waterloo and the University of Haifa. The donation, to be spread over five years, will annually fund more than a dozen exchanges involving faculty, as well as undergraduate and graduate students, at both schools, UW said in a statement.

WORLD

Citizenship Revoked

PITTSBURGH — A U.S. District Court in Pittsburgh revoked the citizenship of an ex-Nazi concentration camp guard. The court acted Sept. 29 against Anton Geiser, 81, of Sharon, Pa., a guard at Sachsenhausen and other wartime camps. He came to the United States from Austria in 1956 and became a citizen in 1962.

Israel Helps Muslims

ABUJA — Israel helped build a mosque in Nigeria. Yediot Achronot on Sept. 28 quoted Israel's ambassador to Abuja as saying his mission donated cement for a mosque for the Fulani, a Muslim tribe. The Israelis became friendly with the Fulanis when several tribesmen attended an agricultural course run by the embassy.

Soldiers Sentenced

ROME — Two ex-German soldiers were sentenced to life in jail Sept. 28 by an Italian miltary court for complicity in murdering civilians. Herbert Stommel and Joseph Scheungraber led their engineering corps unit in a two-day massacre in Falzano di Cortona. They were ordered to pay compensation to the town and to the victims' families.

Spike In Attacks

COPENHAGEN — There were as many attacks on Danish Jews in the first half of 2006 as in all of 2005, the Kristeligt Dagblad newspaper reported. Most attacks have been on people going to shul or children heading to school.

Cemetery Desecrated

MOSCOW — Jewish and Muslim tombstones were vandalized with painted swastikas in a cemetery in central Russia last week in what's believed to be the largest act of cemetery vandalism in post-Communist Russia. Vandals damaged some 150 Jewish and Tatar gravestones in Tver, about 100 miles northwest of Moscow. Police blamed neo-Nazi skinheads.

Mayor Cleared

LONDON — The suspension of London's mayor for comments seen as anti-Semitic will be overturned, a British judge said. Justice Andrew Collins made his comments regarding Ken Livingstone on Oct. 6 after a two-day hearing at the High Court of London. Earlier this year, Livingstone was suspended from office for four weeks by the Adjudication Panel of England for "bringing his office into disrepute" by comparing a Jewish journalist to a concentration camp guard. The suspension was stayed pending the outcome of his hearing.

Ex-Canadian PMs Join Call For Peace Talks

BRUSSELS — Former Canadian prime ministers Jean Chrétien and Kim Campbell, as well as former foreign ministers Lloyd Axworthy and Barbara McDougall, have joined more than 130 other former world leaders in calling for an international conference to try to revive Mideast peace efforts.

Their Oct. 4 declaration urges that the venture be led by the so-called Quartet – the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union – with the participation of the Arab League. It comes after Israel's conflict with Hezbollah and its military foray into Gaza this past summer.

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, ex-Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev and ex-Israeli foreign minister Shlomo Ben-Ami were among others who signed the declaration. It was organized by the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based non-governmental organization.

"Everyone has lost in this conflict, except the extremists throughout the world who prosper on the rage that it continues to provoke," the leaders said.

Peter Munk makes $18.5M donation to Technion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The belief that he can contribute to peace in the Middle East by helping the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology is what fuelled gold magnate Peter Munk's recent $18.5-million to the school, which makes him the largest total Canadian contributor to the institution.

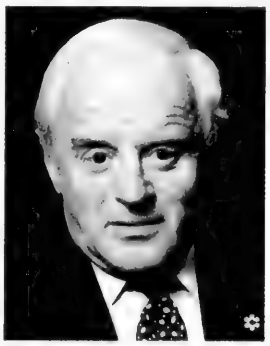
In 1999, Munk – whose uncle Nicholas Munk was a founder of the Canadian Technion Society and whose grandfather was involved in the school's creation – donated $5 million to the Haifa-based school. Another $2 million came from TrizecHahn Corporation and Barrick Gold Corporation, companies that Munk built, and $4.5 million was raised at a dinner in his honour. Other donations of his to the Technion total just under $1 million.

"My old family connection also fits in with my overall thinking of how best we can help Israel and the whole region [by creating] new jobs, new enterprises," Munk told The CJN in a phone interview last week. "[This most recent gift] will create benefits, hopefully, and contribute to peace."

In 1948, Nicholas Munk brought his Hungarian-born nephew, then a penniless 17-year-old, to Canada, where he studied electrical engineering at the University of Toronto.

Munk's most recent gift will establish the Peter Munk Research Institute at the Technion. Its funds will be used for scholarship grants and chairs for "advanced scientific breakthroughs" in several fields of pure and applied science, Munk said.

Earlier this year Munk, 78, gave $37 million to Toronto General Hospital, the largest single gift ever to a Canadian hospital. In 1997, he and his companies donated $6.4 million to the University of Toronto, enabling it to create the Munk Centre for International Studies, directed by Janice Gross Stein.



Peter Munk

Following those two donations, Munk said, he wanted to "do something for the Jewish cause." After much research, he concluded that the Technion is his "favourite project" in Israel.

He made a point of saying, however, that he considers the Technion to be a "secular" cause. "The Technion is not known for being religious," Munk said, noting that it has a reputation as the "MIT of the Middle East," in reference to the prestigious Massachussets Institute of Technology.

"I think technological breakthroughs are a forte of Israel, and as such can create enormous impact in a country short of resources," said Munk, who added that he favours "focused" donations.

Although the Israeli arm of his charitable foundation considered donating to other worthy causes, "If we want to have peace, we have to have prosperity," Munk told The CJN.

Just last month, Seymour Schulich – chair of Newmont Capital Ltd., the merchant banking division of one of the largest gold mining companies in the world – also made a major donation to the Technion, giving $20 million (US) to fund the school's faculty of chemistry, which now bears his name. Schulich's donation is likely the largest single donation by a Canadian to an Israeli university.

The timing of the two donations was coincidental, said Arnold Recht, immediate past president of the Canadian Technion Society, who facilitated Munk's gift.

Recht met Munk in 1997 and has become a personal friend despite a 20-year difference in their ages. "He is tremendously focused, he's a very caring individual, and he has a zest for life," Recht said.

Proceeds from the 2006 JNF Toronto Negev Dinner will be directed primarily to the 4,000 square meter Edward and Fran Sonshine Beit Eshel Historical Site Restoration - an active, dynamic centre for heritage and environment education, focusing on leisure time activities.

Ed and Fran Sonshine are confident that the funds raised will exceed what is required to complete their Beit Eshel project, and have agreed to direct any additional funds to a second initiative, Operation Security Blanket – to provide alternative activities for children affected by the war; Project Replant, Rebuild and Restore – replant burned trees in the north; cultivate decimated farmland; fire-fighting upgrading; emergency response equipment and vehicles to supplement current capacity; and to rebuild recreational and tourist areas of Northern Israel.

Underneath the news radar

From the editor's desk

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in the Middle East last week on a whirlwind diplomatic tour.

Her publicly stated reason for the trip was to lend support to the moderate forces in the area. There were undoubtedly non-publicly stated reasons for her trip as well. The United States and Israel have a great many issues of common concern and sharing intelligence is vital for the security of both countries.

We can only speculate whether the subject of Iran arose during her meetings with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert or Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. It undoubtedly did. As the presidency of George W. Bush winds down, the sense of urgency of dealing with the nuclear ambitions of Tehran heightens.

Because of this, there is a great deal of interest on the part of the American administration to try to show, at least, if not actually achieve, some movement toward agreement between Israelis and Palestinians.

Thus, last Wednesday, Rice met with Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, whom she counts among the region's moderate forces. Meeting with Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian Hamas leader, was out of the question.

As the cameras and tape recorders were whirring and clicking, the secretary of state did her best to affirm and to buttress her host's diplomatic stature for the benefit of his Palestinian and wider Arab constituency.

"The U.S. is very concerned about the plight of the Palestinians. The Palestinians need a government that can provide for their needs," she told the media with an unsubtle nod in the direction of her host.

To her credit, Rice did not avoid the subject of the disqualification of Hamas to be that government, for she also emphasized "the importance of meet[ing] the conditions of the Quartet." She was referring to the need for the PA government (led by Hamas) to recognize Israel, forswear violence and honour the agreements already signed with Israel.

To date, however, Hamas has refused to meet these conditions. Haniyeh does not concede Israel any national entitlement. Western funds to his government have therefore dried up. The Palestinian economy suffers as a result.

"I promised Chairman Abbas to double our efforts to improve the living conditions of Palestinians," she said emphatically.

Later that day, she met with Olmert, who told her that Israel would help Abbas "create a better environment" for the Palestinians to try to return to peacemaking.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni

Israel would soon open the Karni commercial crossing into the Gaza Strip, as well as the Rafah crossing between the Gaza Strip and Egypt, for the month-long Muslim holiday of Ramadan.

To Olmert's credit as well, he categorically rejected Abbas' request, as communicated through the American secretary, to release Palestinian prisoners.

"With all my desire to help, I will not agree to release Palestinian prisoners before Gilad Shalit is returned to Israel," Olmert told Rice.

All the while Rice was meeting with Abbas, Olmert and others, Hamas and Fatah gunmen were engaged in what might be aptly termed, a low-level civil war.

Last Thursday, for example, armed men shot and killed a senior Fatah member in the southern Gaza town of Rafah, while in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahia gunmen critically wounded a member of Hamas.

Violence had escalated throughout the week. Ha'aretz reported some 14 people had been killed in Gaza and the West Bank (as of last Thursday). More than a hundred had been injured. "It was the worst week of internal bloodshed since the Palestinian Authority was created in 1994."

The Palestinian-versus-Palestinian violence seemed to have flown under the radar screens of the mainstream press last week. Most of the violence went unreported. It begs the question, however, whether Israeli-versus-Palestinian violence would have also been similarly unreported.

Human Rights Watch, an NGO not generally know for an understanding or empathetic attitude toward Israel, was so alarmed by the rapidly distintegrating situation among the Palestinians that it "called on the leaders of Palestinian factions and Palestinian government officials to bring an immediate end to the lawlessness and vigilante violence."

If peace with Israel is Abbas' true strategic objective, he will soon have to do what he has refused to do and was urged to do months before. He will have to disarm and disengage Hamas. But the wily Palestinian leader has, to date, shown no desire to do so. His abject refusal to do so speaks the most penetrating truth about his real desire to advance the peace process with Israel.

Jihadists seek to rule the world: JPost editor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jihadists aspire to rule the world and convert non-Muslims to Islam by the sword, the Jerusalem Post's deputy managing editor and weekly columnist said here recently.

In a fiery speech at Holy Blossom Temple on Sept. 26 that was sponsored by the conservative Canadian Coalition for Democracies and garnered standing applause, Caroline Glick suggested that Islamic radicals want to achieve their objective by toppling Arab regimes, destroying Israel and banishing the western presence in the Middle East.

"This is their vision. This is what they teach their children."

Glick, a former officer in Israel's armed forces, blasted jihadists as totalitarian "Islamo-fascists" who seek "to enslave humanity."

Saying that Islamic fundamentalists value death over life, she warned that global jihad is a force that cannot be appeased through negotiations.

"They're fighting to the death, and nothing we can give will satisfy them."

Glick said that jihadists will exploit every means at their disposal, and that they use the West's open, democratic societies to their advantage.

"The enemy is not far away. It's here," she said in a reference to the recent arrest of 17 Canadian Muslims accused of plotting terrorism.

Glick praised Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper for understanding the precepts of jihad ideology.

Saying that Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah represent but three faces of radical Islam, Glick accused Iran of using terrorist organizations to advance its regional interests.

In combating jihadism, the West must strike a balance between preserving civil liberties and maintaining security, Glick said.

She said that the Palestinian national movement is connected with the jihadist plan to build a caliphate, a global Islamic empire.

Disputing claims that Israel's occupation of the West Bank breeds Palestinian violence, she dismissed such notions as "garbage."

Glick also took issue with the assertion that some Palestinians want to live in peace with Israel.

In another poke at the Palestinians, she said, "We're surrounded by genocidal lunatics who want to destroy us."

She had harsh words for Israel's performance in the recent war in Lebanon and for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's handling of the conflict.

The Israeli government was not interested in eradicating Hezbollah, and should have fought until it defeated its enemy, Glick said.

"We just lost that war," she said. "We should have won it."

Branding Olmert's government as "weightless" and the worst in Israel's history, she said it is simply incapable of defending the country's interests.

Israel is beset by a leadership crisis, she said, but added that Israel has "good, solid leaders" in Benjamin Netanyahu, the head of the Likud party; Natan Sharansky, the former Soviet dissident and ex-Israeli cabinet minister; and Moshe Ya'alon, the former chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces.

Glick, who made aliyah from the United States, urged Jews to immigrate to Israel.

"We can assume more Jews will come, because Israel is a good and reasonable place to live."

Consul general works to promote the 'real Israel'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In the three years that Ya'acov Brosh has been Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, it has been his business to make sure that Canadians forge a connection with the State of Israel.

The Haifa-born consul general – who joined the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1987 and served as the director of the Palestinian Autonomy Division and the Jordan, Syria and Lebanon Division – said powerful and influential Canadians know very little about Israel.

"What they hear from the media are all these things that generally give them a horrible message. The general message is that Israel is a bad place to be… They know nothing about Israel, about what we call 'real Israel.' Real Israel is very vibrant, very normal, very developed and so on," said Brosh, who served two terms as minister counsellor at the Israeli Embassy in Cairo, from 1992 to 1994 and 1996 to 2000.

He said that before he moved to Toronto in 2003 to assume the position of consul general, he dealt mainly with Middle Eastern issues and knew very little about Canada.

"About Canada, I knew what most Israelis know. You have a lot of water, it's a big country, it's beautiful. I believed in the deception that you have bears," Brosh said with a grin, describing his disappointment after spending two weeks in British Columbia searching for bears and resigning himself to the fact that it must be nothing more than a tourist gimmick.

While preparing for the job, he decided that although the political relationship between Israel and Canada was not problematic, it could be better.

"When we compare Canada to Europe, [Canada's relationship with Israel] was always better. It wasn't better than Australia at the time, certainly not better than the United States, but better than most of Europe. Of course, now the political relations are much warmer," he said, referring to Prime Minister Steven Harper's support for Israel.

Ya'acov Brosh

Throughout his term, Brosh has focused on improving political and economic ties by exposing Canadians to Israel by sending delegations to Israel.

In January 2005, 21 heads of various faculties at six Canadian universities – York University, Ryerson University, University of Saskatoon, University of Manitoba, McGill University and Bishop's University – spent a week in Israel, visiting Israeli institutions.

He said the goal of sending the delegation was to encourage Canadian universities to offer courses related to Israel that go beyond the Middle Eastern conflict.

He acknowledged that professors at Israeli universities are a good authority on Middle Eastern studies, and he is not against schools implementing courses on the subject, but he wants Canadian faculties to know that there is more to Israel than the conflict, that it is a normal, developed country.

"When you send people like professors, these are people who will tomorrow speak in front of classes. These are people who will educate the next educated generation of Canada," Brosh said, adding that visiting Israeli universities was an eye-opening experience for some of the delegates, who have since created stronger ties with Israeli schools.

For example, York, which already had a good relationship with Israeli universities, developed a program with Ben-Gurion University that enables Canadian students to benefit from its medical school program and Israeli students to benefit from York's law school program, he said.

Last year, the consulate, in co-operation with the CEO of Mount Sinai Hospital and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), sent another delegation, of 12 CEOs of medical centres from all over Canada, to visit Israeli hospitals and meet with Israeli doctors who are experienced in the field of trauma care.

He said that when the the delegation returned, he asked the participants to write a one-page report about their impressions.

"Beyond the niceties… one sentence that was repeated in most of the letters was that if it was not for that trip… they would never have thought about considering Israeli products," Brosh said.

"And it was so enlightening because now they are aware of how developed Israel is and what wonderful products they have to offer…These delegations are not just educational but economic."

He said that often, professionals work with Israeli products and don't even know they originated in Israel.

For instance, Given Imaging Ltd., an Israeli research and development company, recently produced non-evasive technology that is used to diagnose gastrointestinal tract disorders by having the patient ingest a pill-sized camera. The single-use, video colour-imaging capsule glides naturally through the digestive tract while transmitting 50,000 images to a portable data recorder.

Toronto boasts largest delegation of shlichim

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The fact that Toronto has the largest delegation of Jewish Agency shlichim (emissaries from Israel) worldwide indicates that the Jewish community has a meaningful desire to connect with Israel, says Rabbi Natan Kandler, the educational shaliach here.

Rabbi Kandler, who co-ordinates the 33 schlichim teachers – there are 45 shlichim in total – also works with schools, supplemental programs, youth movements and synagogues.

"A strong connection with Israel is best done with emissaries who bring a face [of Israel] to the country [they come to]," he says.

"We work with everyone from preschoolers to youth movement members and university students, to those who make their own decision to move to Israel.

"[It is the mutual goal] of all shlichim to make Israel the meeting point of the community," she says.

Itai Ziedenberg, a shaliach with Hashomer Hatzair, a social youth movement that also runs Camp Shomria in Ontario, says that in the past, shlichim used to present a "flat" picture of Israel.

"We now understand that Israel has a lot of contradictions. The fact that we can now engage with Israel yet still criticize it, is a significant change. The reality is not flat, we can disagree and still be engaged."

Dafna Regev, in a new position, works with students at York University, University of Toronto and Ryerson University. "My goal is to make Israel more familiar and more interesting by offering them a different way to look at the country.

"[Instead of just politics] I'm trying to teach them about Israeli art, culture and society. By meeting me, they're seeing a young Israeli [who is just like them]."

Rabbi Kandler says that aliyah is an important part of the Jewish Agency's agenda, "but identity is no less a major component. Affiliation with Israel is complex. Most of our information comes from the media, but we believe that as educators, it is our task to introduce Israel as a multi-layered country.

"We want to give people a sense that Israel is not necessarily a war zone. It is a vibrant country that has outstanding achievements. We want people to look at Israel in a long-term way, not just as an emergency response."

Sela, who has a background in public relations, says she took her current position after seeing an ad on the Internet about marketing the idea of aliyah.

"We want people to see that they can move to Israel, not only for Zionist reasons, but because they will have the opportunity for a good life. It is a small country, but it is full of options."

Also involved with Israel programs such as kibbutz ulpan (where people learn Hebrew and work on a kibbutz), Magen David Adom and Partnership 2000, a partnership between the Diaspora and underdeveloped areas of Israel – youth from the Toronto community volunteered in Eilat – Sela says she "met young volunteers who were in Israel all summer, and they said they 'somehow' felt different there. Engaging with Israel is not always logical; it can be very emotional.

"The partnership with Eilat and Toronto gives young people the opportunity to become part of a community building itself."

Israel is a unique place, Sela says. "Israelis suffered greatly from the war [this past summer] but they have all moved on."

Having worked in public relations, she says, she finds it exciting to be working at something so close to her heart. "I'm marketing my country, and I'm working with people's lives.

"When someone comes to see me about making aliyah, I always ask 'why?' I'll never say no, because they're entitled to come home, but I will let them see the reality. I'll make sure they have the correct picture."

As a group, the shlichim don't necessarily share the same views, says Rabbi Kandler, "but we do have a fascinating common denominator. We work on mutual projects and we meeting at least on a monthly basis.

"We all also value the ongoing contributions of the Toronto Jewish community [to Israel]."

Harper takes stand based on principle

It shocked the delegates from the 53 member states of la Francophonie who had gathered last week for their annual summit in Bucharest. In truth, it even shocked many Canadians. Prime Minister Stephen Harper, speaking on behalf of Canada, would not accede to an attempt by Egypt to have the gathering endorse a political declaration expressing sympathy only for the Lebanese civilian victims of last summer's war.

The Egyptian proposal was not adopted. The chair of the proceedings withdrew it, because Canada's refusal to rubber-stamp the proposed propaganda effectively vetoed it. Resolutions, statements and declarations at la Francophonie require consensus approval to become official statements of the organization.

"The Francophonie cannot recognize victims according to their nationality," Harper told the world. "Obviously, Canada believes that the resolution has to be balanced and that we should recognize the victims in both Lebanon and Israel. I don't think an international organization with the breadth and scope of la Francophonie would want to do anything other than to make sure that victims are recognized regardless of their nationality."

There could hardly be a pithier, more concise expression of so important a truth. Indeed, after Harper gave voice to it, Switzerland found its own courage and supported his position.

Harper's statement caused tempers to flare and delegates to fume. Many of them were offended and expressed deep personal umbrage that this Canadian leader, a first-time Francophonie participant, had deigned to interject his conscience into their lofty, though morally stilted, proceedings.

In the end, compromise language was found for the organization's statement on the war. "In deploring the tragedy in Lebanon and its dramatic consequences for all of the civilian populations, we call for a total cessation of hostilities and a return to calm in Lebanon."

Imagine! How novel it is that la Francophonie actually deplores the consequences of war for all civilians.

The Egyptian representative undoubtedly assumed his proposal would pass as yet another in the very long list of business-as-usual, innocuous, anti-Israel declarations on the Middle East conflict. But he didn't count on Harper's refusal to conduct political business as usual. He didn't realize there was a leader at the summit for whom fairness toward Israel is a matter of deep abiding principle. Harper deserves the thanks of Canadians. He has done what so few Canadians – or other western leaders, for that matter – have done in the past, when the "great majority," to use French President Jacques Chirac's phrase, chose a patently discriminatory, immoral course against the Jewish state.

Harper has stared down the bully. In the process, perhaps he has shown others how they could also do so in the future.

25 years ago in The CJN

The assassination of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat led to concern about the future of the 1977 peace treaty between Egypt and Israel. Sadat's successor, Hosni Mubarak, linked honouring the treaty commitments with Palestinian autonomy.

Auschwitz transports

Your readers may not have realized that the Lipietz brothers, who have received a judgment in their favour from an administrative court in Toulouse, were never deported to Auschwitz 62 years ago, but rather from that city to the Gare d'Austerlitz in Paris. So far as the Auschwitz transports are concerned, as Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld has pointed out, the Germans took over complete responsibility for the trains once they left French territory.

At issue, then, is the extent to which the French National Railway Company (SNCF) was in control of the situation – i.e. calling the shots – for deportation convoys. This is what the plaintiffs in the case contend. The defence argues that the Germans, and to a lesser extent the French government, were calling the shots. The Toulouse administrative court's judgment hardly touched on this. We'll see how the appeals go. Importantly, the Toulouse judgment was issued by an administrative court, which refused to credit the plaintiff's charges of crimes against humanity, but rather decided – with very little supporting argument – that the SNCF was responsible for having committed a "faute de service." Presumably, if the Lipietz brothers had been sent in third-class carriages, they would not have succeeded with this court.

Unsurprisingly, many French Jewish leaders do not support these lawsuits that seem to many of them and their non-Jewish compatriots to extend the bounds of Holocaust responsibility beyond what seems legally or historically reasonable. French historians, so far as I know, are apoplectic. Reasonable people will disagree about these matters, of course, but your readers should at least know that there is a difference of opinion.

I am wondering what Rabbi Dow Marmur actually listened to at this year's Ashkenaz Festival ("Epitaph for Yiddish," CJN, Sept. 28) It seems to me he has only read the brochure, not very carefully at that, or he would have noticed that nobody performed My Yiddishe Mama, or other typical nostalgic Yiddish songs. The festival's name is, after all, "festival of new Yiddish culture" and they mean it!

Ashkenaz is a great example of the fact that Yiddish is still a language of new creative works. This year two new Yiddish recordings (both based on new Yiddish poetry) were released at the festival – Theresa Tova's CD, You ask me why… Tova Sings Beyle and Brian Katz's and my Pashtes. As well, A Gesheft, the first all-Yiddish film made in New York in 50 years, had its Toronto premiere there.

Rabbi Marmur is equally dismissive and uninformed when claiming that Yiddish lovers as a whole are not religiously inclined, which, while true for some, is not true for others.

Why position Judaism and Yiddish culture as enemies? I see them as two sides of the same coin that are for me both essential expressions of my Jewish identity.

Ashkenaz Festival (2)

I am at a loss to understand Rabbi Dow Marmur's obvious bias against the joyous Ashkenaz Festival and what it stands for – apparently after no more than a glance at the printed program!

Whether or not Yiddish survives after suffering the annihilation of our people in Europe, its suppression in Israel and the toll of assimilation elsewhere is not the point. What is important and should bring pride and pleasure to every Jew is the preservation and appreciation for Jewish history along with the astounding cultural output of Yiddish authors, playwrights, composers and artists during the golden age of our people in the 19th and early 20th centuries.

Looking for the Kaufman family

I am trying to trace relatives of my grandmother, Annie Kaufman, born in Stepney, London, in 1880. She was the daughter of Rose and Joseph Kaufman. There were lots of siblings – possibly as many as 19 survived. Recently some photographs, taken in Toronto, have come to light.

One photograph is of Dorothy Rose Kaufman, aged 11 weeks, and another, taken in 1938, is of Dorothy at approximately seven to eight years old, in the garden in Toronto's High Park, with her mother, Minnie.

There are several photographs of a man, presumably Dorothy's father, who we think is Annie's brother – possibly Philip Kaufman. There is also a photograph of Dorothy, Minnie and another man, in an army uniform, who we think is another brother, possibly Godfrey Kaufman, who went to live in the United States.

This article is a cri de coeur to prospective Jewish philanthropists.

The author focuses on the key role of Jewish education – mostly childhood education – in fostering Jewish identity and affiliation. Though he cites U.S. statistics, they are nevertheless instructive for Canada.

Jewish communities across the country are struggling with the skyrocketing costs of Jewish education. The situation is especially pressing in Ontario, where, unlike other jurisdictions, the province denies funding to religiously based private schools.

There have been many examples of generous donations by individuals and families to Canadian Jewish educational institutions. A number of chairs in or related to Jewish studies have been endowed at our universities.

There have also been very significant donations by philanthropists to nominally Jewish institutions, for secular educational purposes, such as the recent donations to the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa by Seymour Schulich and, as reported in this issue of The CJN, by Peter Munk.

But the many individual acts of generosity and kindness to date, alas, are not enough to make significant inroads into the incessantly and rapidly increasing costs of Jewish education.

Indeed, in Toronto, UJA Federation has recently announced its intention to create a $100-million education endowment fund as a partial response to meeting the many urgent needs of Jewish education.

Thus, we provide this recently written reflection on the necessity to more frequently link Jewish philanthropy with Jewish education.

– The editor

Yeshiva University recently received a gift of $100 million (US) from its staunch supporter, New York City industrialist Ronald P. Stanton. This magnificent gift is cause both for celebration and for thoughtful reflection on the nature of Jewish philanthropy today.

Generosity, as embodied in the broader concept of tzedakah, is a fundamental Jewish value. The ethical obligation and communal responsibility to give propels and shapes our response to people in need, both in the Jewish community and in the wider world.

Morry J. Weiss

As chairman of the board of trustees of Yeshiva University, North America's oldest and most comprehensive educational institution under Jewish auspices, I speak for all my colleagues in expressing our gratitude to Stanton. As the father of four Yeshiva University graduates, I look forward to seeing how this gift will further enhance and enrich the educational experience awaiting our grandchildren.

But at the same time, I can't help wondering why there aren't more people like Stanton? In recent years, we have all read about mega-gifts by Jewish contributors, multimillion-dollar donations to institutions that serve the community at large: cultural centres, medical foundations, educational establishments, charitable organizations, etc. These are wonderful gifts that represent the best of Jewish philanthropy. Yet, why are we not regularly reading about gifts of such magnitude to Jewish institutions.

"American Jews have achieved levels of wealth unprecedented in our history," writes Michael H. Steinhardt in an essay, Priming the Pump of Jewish Philanthropy. "The problem is that we no longer give much to Jewish causes."

Steinhardt calculates that perhaps 20 per cent or less of Jewish giving goes to Jewish causes. Of the $5.3 billion in mega-gifts given by America's wealthiest Jews between 1995 and 2000, only six per cent went to Jewish institutions. Among those Jews who do give, only 11 per cent donate more than $1,000 to Jewish causes.

It's been well documented that in North America, the greatest threat to the Jewish people is the loss of our identity from apathy, inertia and, most importantly, ignorance of our own heritage. Education, like tzedakah, is also central to Jewish values. But I would say that education deserves primacy of place.

Numerous studies show a direct correlation between Jewish childhood education and Jewish identity as an adult. One of the most emblematic of these studies is the 2004 report by Steven M. Cohen, The Impact of Childhood Jewish Education on Adults' Jewish Identity, published as part of the United Jewish Communities Report Series.

According to Cohen, only 16 per cent of those who received no Jewish schooling felt that being Jewish was "very important," compared to 51 per cent of those who had at least seven years of supplementary school and 86 per cent of those who had at least seven years of day school.

More than two-thirds of people who received no Jewish education married someone of another religion, while 96 per cent of those with at least seven years of Jewish day school married another Jew. Synagogue membership, observance of religious rituals and attachment to Israel all showed a similar pattern.

"Rises in the level of childhood Jewish schooling are almost always associated with increases in adult Jewish identity years later," Cohen concludes.

Fortunately, at Yeshiva University, young people can continue investing in their Jewish education as a key part of their higher education.

Education is not just the cornerstone of a Jewish identity but the skeleton of our ethical system. Without knowledge of our heritage, without learning how to bring the teachings of the Torah to daily life, how can we ensure that we live – and give – both generously and wisely?

Many influential and insightful people before me have sounded this same call – and, like Stanton, have put their money where their mouth is. Nearly three decades ago, businessman Joseph S. Gruss, in partnership with what became the UJA-Federation of New York, founded the Fund for Jewish Education and the Caroline and Joseph S. Gruss Life Monuments Fund, which together provide health and life insurance benefits for Jewish teachers, most of them in day schools in the New York area.

The Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), founded in 1997, brings together multiple philanthropic partners from around North America to strengthen Jewish day schools in North America. Individual visionaries like Max Fisher in Detroit, George Hanus in Chicago, Mort Mandel in Cleveland, and Leslie Wexner of Columbus, Ohio, are among others who have committed their energies and a good part of their fortunes to Jewish education. These men and women and the foundations they created or support are models for the rest of us.

I'm especially excited by Stanton's donation to Yeshiva University, not only because it is the largest single gift ever in North America in support of Jewish education and Jewish life, but because of its innovative nature. As a "revolving" fund, the Ronald P. Stanton Legacy provides the initial assets for specific growth initiatives with the stipulation that those assets will be replenished when named gifts for these programs are received from other benefactors.

It is my strongest hope that this legacy will not just serve as seed money for projects that benefit Yeshiva University but that it will also sow the seeds of tzedakah more widely throughout the entire Jewish community and in Israel. My dream is that we will all work together to raise the bar for ourselves and others so that Jewish education can further enhance and enrich Jewish life.

It is to help maintain the viability of Jewish education of all stripes and affiliations that the author pleads for more philanthropic involvement from the community. [Rebecca Ansel photo]

Why Israel is so central

Within most Jewish communities, it's recognized that support for Israel is one of the principal forces that drives advocacy, as well as educational and cultural programming, and, not least of all, fundraising.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

I was stunned, therefore, when I was recently told by one of our local Jewish leaders that I should not assume that everyone in our community was as ardent a Zionist as I was. And while I regarded the remark as something of a backhanded compliment, I was nonetheless troubled by the derisive tone in which it was delivered.

Could it be, in fact, that the centrality of Israel, which has long been so integral to the Jewish agenda, is beginning to erode? Could it be that, particularly in the Diaspora, new and competing priorities are slowly weakening a once inviolable relationship?

Part of the answer may lie in the very definition of Zionism or, at least, in its modern interpretation.

A plausible enunciation of the aims of Zionism was adopted by the World Zionist Organization in 1968. Since then, and despite other iterations that have captured more or less the same tone, the essentials of that earlier consensus are still regarded as the key reference for most ongoing debates on Zionist values.

The first component of the 1968 document, later known as the Jerusalem Program, calls for "the unity of the Jewish people and the centrality of Israel in Jewish life." Not surprisingly, there have been differing perceptions of the notion of "centrality," some of them nuanced, some more definitive.

What would seem to be important, though, is that regardless of how centrality is viewed within particular segments of our community, there is nonetheless room for broadly integrating it within an overall conceptualization of Zionism.

At the very least, centrality can be framed as an expression of positive attitudes toward Israel. Within a more general context, it can be seen to underpin a Zionist ideology that reflects an all-encompassing approach to the problems of the Jewish people.

In advancing this paradigm, historian Gil Troy goes much further, stating that "modern Zionism needs to be radical, subversive, visionary, inspiring, provocative, evocative and relevant." In a compelling 2003 essay titled "I am a Zionist," he vibrantly articulates his Zionist philosophy and why he is drawn to it. "I am a Zionist," he affirms, "because I am a Jew – and without recognizing a national component in Judaism, I cannot explain its unique character."

Perhaps this is how I should have responded to my friend in Hamilton – who seems somehow to have missed the point that unless we, as Jews, all commit to being Zionists, ardent or otherwise, we will have lost the very essence of who we are and what we should be striving for.

Startling revelations from on high

I've had several opportunities in recent months to journey the length and breadth of Israel by helicopter. Helicopter flights are becoming an increasingly popular component of the tourist experience for those who can afford them. Not only is it possible, by economizing on travel time, to squeeze more into a single day, but there's simply no better way of getting a real feel for the lay of the land.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

The big vistas from overhead give a very different picture from the one gained through incremental, sideways-looking eyefuls of Israel at ground level. And speaking for myself, I was astonished, despite my close familiarity with this country, at the incredibly rich and compressed diversity of landforms, land uses, climatic zones, and historical treasures that unfolds before your gaze.

Every few minutes the scene changes absolutely: a barren Judean Desert sidles right up to dense hilltop forests, sheer precipices drop into the brutal flatlands of the Jordan Rift, the towering, snow-capped peaks of the Hermon plummet into the luscious fertility of the Hula valley, and urban jungles peter out into gorgeous patchwork embroideries of cultivated fields. And in and among all this are world-class antiquities sites.

When one bears in mind that visiting Jewish tourists (and to a significant degree Israeli Jews as well) consciously avoid substantial sections of the country, this should come as no great surprise. Generally speaking, most of us restrict our itineraries, lodgings and movements to a carefully circumscribed selection of hotels, tourist attractions and those parts of the largest cities and countryside that we feel safe and good in. Only very occasionally do we venture beyond the perimeter fence of a Jewish geography. Almost always, we stick closely to the main highways and roads, thus getting only a censored, tunnel-vision view of the land.

A helicopter flight opens up the hitherto unexplored hinterland and border areas to our view, and it can be a revelation.

For one thing, the vantage of height brings into clear focus the extreme fragility of Israel's predicament. No sooner is one airborne from Tel Aviv on the seashore, for instance, when the hills of the West Bank, clear across the other side of the narrow waistline of the state, loom into view. The entire width of this national heartland – a thin, 10-mile wide sliver of land where a good two-thirds of Israelis live and work, where the bulk of the industrial and financial potential is situated – is grasped at a single, effortless glance. What one sees is a lowland network of urban conglomerations locked between the sea on one side and big Palestinian West Bank population centres, places such as Tulkarm and Kalkilya, on the other.

So tight are the quarters that your pilot must take great pains never to deviate significantly from the straight and narrow path of this air corridor through which flows the lifeblood of a nation, lest you rapidly find yourself out over open waters, or overflying hostile territory and in potentially deep trouble.

Yet another, more startling revelation awaits you, too. Although supposedly 80 per cent Jewish in its population, Israel, over great swathes of its already miniscule territory, is actually quite Arab in character. The statistics are deceiving. Spitting distance inland from Tel Aviv and Netanya, mere minutes into the flight, clusters of very sizeable Israeli Arab villages, towns and small cities constitute a prominent presence in the landscape below. The Jewish population, one easily detects, huddles tightly together in large and dense urban blocks, while the more rural Arab population is scattered far and wide over much of the surrounding countryside.

Up north in the Galilee, these same distribution patterns are even more conspicuous. The five or six Jewish cities aside, the overall impression is of a prevalent and perhaps predominant Arab presence. Groves of olive trees, the mainstay of the Arab economy, stretch, in places, out to the horizon, and certainly well beyond the mental horizons of what many of us perceive to be a Jewish state.

We'll survive, but what about the West?

"Will there be an Israel in 2020?" This question wasn't posed by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad but by Peter Osnos, a well-known and influential American journalist, publisher and pundit. He was responding to another columnist, Richard Cohen, who wrote that Israel's establishment in 1948 was a well-intentioned mistake, "creating a nation of European Jews in an area of Arab Muslims." Cohen urged Israel to adopt a low profile and rely on diplomacy, rather than force, to preserve its remaining international legitimacy.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

These myths notwithstanding, Israel became a sovereign state because Jews realized that there was no alternative in the fight for national survival. (In November 1947, the United Nations gave Israel some welcome moral support, but not much more.) And the same drive will preserve Israel as a sovereign Jewish state, equal in status to Muslim, Christian, Hindu and other nations.

In 1947, the pundits predicted that Israel would be crushed by a massive Arab demographic advantage, hostile armies and a hopelessly small economy. Six decades later, Israel's Jewish population has grown by a factor of ten, to more than six million, while the shekel is stronger than the U.S. dollar and the Israeli military is dominant, despite some limitations.

At the same time, Osmos has finally recognized the obvious – that Arab violence is not the result of a territorial dispute for which a negotiated solution can be found, but from the fact that "hundreds of millions are taught to despise." He goes on to note that the "rage of the Middle East is intractable as other world conflicts are not… it is no different now than it was at the time Israel was created in 1948." But this rage only succeeds when it is left unanswered. In Egypt, the price of war and the fear of total destruction led to mutual deterrence (what some call "peace"), and eventually the same will happen in Syria, Lebanon and even Iran. The leaders of these countries are violent, but they're not suicidal.

In this context, it's important to counter the misleading pessimism about Israel's future that grew out of images from Lebanon, and the conclusions that Israel met its match in the form of Hezbollah fighters armed by Iran. Despite some operational errors (found in every military force) and the current leadership crisis, Israel ended the war with far fewer casualties than were expected, and with a more favourable strategic relationship with Hezbollah. Osnos' assertion that "nothing works anymore for Israel" is facile and wrong – more proof that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing.

Instead, his question about survival should be pointed elsewhere – toward Europe and the West. Will London, Birmingham, Paris, Brussels, Rotterdam, etc. become satellites orbiting around a dominant Muslim empire – in other words, part of Eurabia?

Al Qaeda leader Osama Bin Laden and the wider global jihad movement proclaim their goal of rebuilding the Islamic empire during its glory days, up to Spain (Andalusia) and beyond. The terror attacks of 9/11 and the terror attacks in London, Madrid, Paris and elsewhere were not motivated by events in Israel or the plight of the Palestinians. It's not only Israel that, to quote Osmos again, is "surrounded by countries and movements that at worst are sworn to its destruction and at best merely despise it."

After 2000 years of stateless exile, persecution and mass murder, the Jewish people have no options other than to use force in self defence – and the Arabs generally understand this. Occasionally, they need to be reminded that Israel is prepared to use what has been called "disproportionate power." To quote Osmos again, "when security and dominance of its borders are at stake, Israel suspends the pleasantries. The image of Israel in the rest of the world focuses on that ferocity."

In contrast, the dominant western response to Islamic terror is compromise, dialogue, apology and calls for understanding. This form of political correctness won't work against the violence of mass terror and calls for global jihad. The question for Osmos, Cohen and other pundits is whether the West will recognize the need for a more ferocious response in time for it to survive.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel completed its withdrawal from Lebanon on Oct. 1, thereby fulfilling a key provision of United Nations Resolution 1701, which ended Israel's 34-day war with Hezbollah in mid-August. On the eve of Yom Kippur, under the cover of darkness, the last of Israel's troops crossed the border in an armoured column, leaving southern Lebanon in the untested hands of the puny Lebanese army and the beefed-up United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, known as UNIFIL.

But Israel's departure left several vital issues unresolved and did little to calm bitter recriminations inside Israel over the conduct of the war, its purpose and its outcome. No sooner had the Israeli army withdrawn than Hezbollah's deputy secretary general, Sheikh Naim Kassem, warned that warfare could resume if Israel remained in two contested areas in Lebanon: Shebaa Farms and the divided village of Ghajar.

Shebaa Farms, on the southwestern slopes of Mount Hermon, was captured by Israel from Syria during the Six Day War. Lebanon did not claim Shebaa Farms until Israel unilaterally withdrew from southern Lebanon in May 2000 after a 22-year occupation. The United Nations certified Israel's withdrawal, classifying Shebaa Farms as Syrian territory. But Lebanon and Hezbollah insisted that it was Lebanese, and Syria cynically concurred.

Piously presenting itself as the guardian of Lebanese sovereignty, Hezbollah exploited the dispute to attack Israeli fortifications in Shebaa Farms and shell settlements in Israel itself. For six years, before the second war in Lebanon erupted on July 12, Hezbollah stirred up trouble in southern Lebanon with the complicity of Lebanon's weak, pro-Syrian government.

And now, following an inconclusive war in which 116 Israeli soldiers were killed and towns in the Galilee were subjected to daily rocket barrages that claimed the lives of 43 civilians, damaged thousands of buildings, sent one million Israelis into bomb shelters and paralyzed the local economy, Hezbollah is once again threatening to unleash the dogs of war over Shebaa Farms and a less prominent issue, Ghajar, whose northern half Israel controls.

Hezbollah's threat may be merely bluster, but who knows? Hezbollah has repeatedly proven that it is ready to take up arms, no matter what the cost, and the recent war is an example of its brinkmanship. Thanks to Hezbollah's recklessness, 1,200 Lebanese civilians were needlessly killed and much of Lebanon's infrastructure was wrecked. So would Hezbollah fight a second round for the sake of Shebaa Farms and Ghajar? Perhaps.

It is indeed an open question how far Hezbollah will go in pursuit of its fiery rhetoric. But Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, clearly wants a political solution. He has stated that if the Lebanese side fulfills its obligations under UN Resolution 1701, he would be prepared to discuss the status of Shebaa Farms. One can assume that Olmert would also be willing to put Ghajar on the table. But Olmert's apparent flexibility is conditional on Hezbollah's willingness to release Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, the Israeli reservists who were abducted on July 12 and whose kidnapping touched off the war, and on the disarmament of Hezbollah.

The imprisonment of Goldwasser and Regev is a serious humanitarian issue and belies Olmert's solemn promise to secure their freedom. But the disarmament of Hezbollah, as demanded by the UN in two separate resolutions since 2004, may well determine whether Lebanon can be stabilized once and for all. Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon nearly two weeks ago was, in fact, delayed by this issue.

Israel had intended to withdraw prior to Rosh Hashanah. But in negotiating the rules of engagement with UNIFIL, Israel discovered that the peacekeeping force, headed by France, had no intention of disarming Hezbollah. The French general in charge, Alain Pellegrini, declared that UNIFIL's role was to assist the Lebanese army, not to disarm Hezbollah or even to prevent future attacks. Three days after the war came to an end, Condoleezza Rice, the U.S. secretary of state, issued a similar comment: "I don't think there is an expectation that this force is going to physically disarm Hezbollah."

It appears that Israel has reluctantly accepted this limitation on UNIFIL's powers, banking on the hope that a UN arms embargo will make it impossible for Iran and Syria to resupply Hezbollah. But even here, Israel has cause for concern. Pellegrini has said that UNIFIL will not deploy along Lebanon's border with Syria, but will instead rely on the Lebanese army to choke off the flow of weaponry to Hezbollah and on Syria to respect the embargo. Last week, Syria's president, Bashar Assad, pledged to be vigilant in patrolling the border and urged the UN to have "faith" in Syria's putative commitment to comply with the embargo. But there is no guarantee that Syria – a conduit of Iranian rockets to Hezbollah – will follow through.

Lebanon's attitude on Hezbollah's disarmament is problematic as well. Fuad Siniora, the prime minister, has said that no steps will be taken to defang Hezbollah as long as Israel occupies even an inch of Lebanon. The Lebanese defence minister, Elias Murr, has been blunter: "The army is not going to the south to strip Hezbollah of its weapons and do the work that Israel did not."

As for Hezbollah, which held Israel to a draw in the fighting, it is as defiant as ever. Boasting of its "great, divine, historic and strategic victory" over Israel, Hezbollah's secretary general, Hassan Nasrallah, said last month that it will never relinquish its arsenal of weapons. At a rally in Beirut on Sept. 22, he said that Hezbollah – which fired approximately 3,800 Katyushas at Israel during the war – still has about 20,000 rockets at its disposal. This means that Hezbollah can still inflict pain on Israel should it decide to do so.

Due to the uncertain situation, Israel continues to launch surveillance flights over Lebanon, all in the face of UN opposition. Israel's position is that it will maintain the overflights until Resolution 1701 is fully implemented and Lebanon is pacified.

As these events play out, Israel finds itself embroiled on the home front. Olmert, having admitted that there were failures in managing the war and supporting the civilian population, has established a committee, headed by retired judge Eliyahu Winograd, to investigate the conflict. But critics have called for a more independent state commission with greater power, like the 1974 Kahan Commission that examined the Yom Kippur War.

Apart from Olmert himself, critics have focused their attention on two central figures: Amir Peretz, the neophyte defence minister, and Gen. Dan Halutz, the chief of staff. Critics charge that there was an overreliance on air power and a hesitancy to commit a substantial number of ground troops to the battle. They also believe that Israel lacked sufficient intelligence about Hezbollah's capabilities and did not allocate enough funds to develop a defence system to counter Katyushas. Efraim Inbar, a professor of political science at Bar-Ilan University, wrote, "A series of strategic follies resulted in an unsuccessful war for Israel. Most of Hezbollah's military presence in southern Lebanon could have been destroyed. Unfortunately, Israel's political and military leadership had no clear concept of what victory over Hezbollah entailed."

Israel might have been able to cripple Hezbollah, but Israel's casualties would have been been horrendously high had it seriously tried. Even if Israel had totally demolished its military assets in the south, Hezbollah could have fired long-range rockets at the Galilee from sites north of the Litani River.

For all its mistakes and miscues in waging this war, Israel did chalk up two successes. In wreaking devastation on Lebanon, Israel re-established its deterrent posture, though many radical Arabs now claim that Israel can be beaten and exterminated. In addition, Israel deprived Hezbollah of its bases close to the northern border area and forced Lebanon and the international community to police it. This arrangement may yet collapse, like previous truces, but in the meantime, southern Lebanon is quiet and Hezbollah holds its fire.

Israel, however, fell far short of achieving one of its primary war aims – separating Lebanon from Hezbollah. The Lebanese government still regards Hezbollah as a vaunted liberation force, as does the rest of the Arab world. Further, Israel is no closer to forging a historic rapprochement with Lebanon. On Aug. 30, Siniora defiantly said that he would refuse to engage Israel, and that Lebanon would be the last Arab country to sign a peace treaty with Israel.

Even Syria, Israel's arch enemy, has a more positive approach to peace than Lebanon.

Last week, in an interview with a Spanish newspaper, Assad said that Israel and Syria would need six months to sign an agreement, provided that Israel agreed to relinquish the Golan Heights.

But in a new year's message, Olmert curtly dismissed the idea of a withdrawal, saying that he intended to retain the Golan as "an integral part of the state of Israel."

Imagine all Jewish lawyers disbarred - it happened in 1933

Holocaust Education Week returns to GTA November 1 to 9

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

It's virtually impossible to imagine today, but when Hitler rose to power in 1933, all Jewish lawyers were disbarred reducing the entire German legal system to a travesty.

On Wednesday, November 1, opening night of the 26th annual Holocaust Education Week (HEW), sponsored by the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, former Ontario premier Bob Rae will discuss how the Nazis twisted the idea of the rule of law.

The event kicks off HEW at 7:30 p.m. at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation. This year's HEW, which includes more than 100 programs, will be available to a wider audience than ever before with events taking place in many small towns across – and outside the Greater Toronto Area, from Kingston to Sudbury.

According to Holocaust Centre chair, Lorraine Sandler, this year's event is, unfortunately, very timely in light of the anti-Israeli sentiment still pervasive in today's world.

"The recent Hezbollah terrorism perpetrated against Israel, and the vulgar and venomous rhetoric that emanates from Iran is evocative of vitriol heard in 1938. Our antennae are alert," said Sandler.

Holocaust Education Week runs from November 1 to 9.

Bob Rae

Other programs of note include The Gold Train (November 2, 7:30 p.m. at Toronto's Beth Radom Synagogue) which will investigate the mystery of what happened to 29 box cars of Nazi-confiscated paintings, artwork and gold. En route from Budapest to Germany, the U.S. army seized the train in Austria but its whereabouts remains unknown.

The Journey that Saved Curious George (November 5, 4:30 p.m. Beth Sholom Synagogue) will unravel the mystery behind the famous monkey's Jewish roots and how the experience of his creators in escaping the Nazis is reflected in the Curious George stories.

HEW concludes with a special program called We Remember And Honour which focuses on members of the legendary Viennese Jewish sports club, Hakoah, which the Nazis shut down in 1938. Fortunately, with the help of their coach, the swimmers all managed to escape before the war broke out. Sixty-five years later, a documentary film called Watermarks was made, featuring the members of Hakoah's legendary women's swim team. On Thursday, November 9 at 7:30 p.m. at Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Synagogue, Greta Stanton, the diving champion featured in the film, will share her memories of that time and the impact of that film on her and her teammates, some of whom she had not seen since 1939.

"We are confident that the lessons taught during HEW will help change the world for the better," said Joan Shapero, co-chair of HEW, with Steven Albin.

"It is education that will combat the various forms of intolerance that regrettably still persist in our world," added Albin.

Partnership with Eilat opens Toronto doors for Israeli students

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

Three Israeli students – a Jerusalem-born Jew, an Arab Christian and a Russian immigrant – have come to Toronto to live and work together for several weeks.

Considering their varied backgrounds and the fact three is quite often a crowd, you may not expect the trio to hit if off. But from day one, that's exactly what they've done.

"It's been very interesting and a completely new experience, a real expedition," related Yitzchak "Itzik" Sachs, the group's Jerusalemite.

The expedition Sachs refers to is a unique internship program for students pursuing a business degree focused on tourism and hotel management at the Eilat campus of Ben-Gurion University. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto provides scholarships to many students on the campus through its partnership with the Eilat-Eilot region.

Sachs, 26, Elena Gavrilov, 26 and Steve Hanhan, 22, are the three students piloting the program in Toronto.

After arriving in September, the interns have been learning the tricks of their trade at the Pantages Suites Hotel & Spa and Cosmopolitan Toronto Hotel, where they do everything from working the front desk, to sales, to attending hotel management seminars with experts from the field.

The program was able to take shape after the owner of the Pantages and Cosmopolitan hotels and chairman of the UJA Federation-affiliated Israeli Forum, Gil Blutrich, learned about the desire to bring Israeli students to Toronto.

"When he was asked to have interns in the hotels, Gil didn't even want to hear the details – he said absolutely," said Galya Sarner, UJA Federation's liaison with Israeli-Canadians in Toronto.

In addition to the practical work experience for which they are paid, the students earn credits towards their business degree.

The internship is part of a broader UJA Federation initiative to encourage Israelis to study in Eilat, Israel's southern resort city whose economy relies heavily on tourism.

"We've struck a partnership with the Eilat campus of Ben-Gurion University to try and make it as attractive as possible for students to choose Eilat," said Adam Minsky, director of Israel and overseas programs for UJA Federation.

"So with this particular program, we're showing students that if you choose Eilat, you'll get perks. The overall idea is to develop Eilat into a university town."

Sachs' inclination to intern in Toronto stemmed from a yearning to experience hotel management in an entirely different setting – the boutique hotel in a multicultural city.

"In Eilat, all the hotels are on the beach. So the experience is about the sun, sea and sand," he said. "In Toronto, these particular hotels are boutique hotels, which is a new niche in the hotel industry that's completely different from what we're used to in Israel. And the second thing is that in Toronto, you have all sorts of different people from all over the world."

Hillel students practice tikun olam

Campus Report is a new feature of Jewish Toronto designed to keep readers up to date about the ongoing campus initiatives of Hillel of Greater Toronto, which is supported by UJA Federation.

By JAIME REICH & DEVORA SCHWARTZ WAXMAN

Pirkei Avot, The Ethics of Our Fathers, teaches us that, "you are not required to complete the task, but neither are you free to neglect it (Pirkei Avot, 3:19-20)". Despite hour long line ups at the campus bookstore, adjusting to new class schedules, piles of reading, part time jobs and trying to have a social life on top of all of that, Hillel's students have not forgotten about those who are less fortunate and have made the Jewish value of tikkun olam, repairing the world, a top priority through Hillel's Tzedek/Social Justice Program.

Tzedek Hillel is off to a great start this year with the launch of several new ongoing volunteer opportunities, and the Hillel at U of T tutoring program for King Edward Public School students. New programs include a Hillel at York Homework Club in partnership with Jewish Family and Child Service, and a partnership between Jewish Women International (JWI), Tanenbaum CHAT and Hillel of Greater Toronto. Hillel students will be trained by JWI to facilitate workshops for high school students at both Tanenbaum CHAT campuses to educate teenagers about how to recognize and confront dating abuse.

Hillel of Greater Toronto students rolled up their sleeves in Mississippi in January following Hurricane Katrina to help the community rebuild. The Hillel students will be returning to the South again this year to continue their voluntarism efforts.

Tzedek Hillel will be on the move again this year. Plans are underway for a return trip to the Gulf Coast to continue rebuilding efforts following last year's devastating hurricane season. Hillel is also looking into a volunteer program in partnership with Hillel Uruguay over reading week, to build homes for those who cannot afford suitable housing. In the spirit of rebuilding, several Toronto area students will travel to northern Israel this winter to participate in Hillel International's Rebuild the North program. To end this exciting year of travel, Tzedek Hillel is looking into an extended trip to Central America in the spring in partnership with American Jewish World Service.

Jaime Reich is vice-president of Hillel at York University and Devora Schwartz Waxman is director of Tzedek/Social Action Programs for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Israel, Iran and US election are hot topics on Washington Fly-In

Charles Krauthammer, David Frum among those to address Torontonians

By REBECCA SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

From Israel to Iran to U.S. domestic politics, the analysis from noted experts was plentiful and intense for participants on UJA Federation's recent one day fly-in to Washington D.C., chaired by Irwin Michael and Andrew Sheiner.

At the Canadian embassy, David Frum, acclaimed author and former speech writer for US President George Bush, shared what he called "well informed speculation" that Iran will pause its 'nuclearization' and stop its support for insurgency in Iraq, while the US will oppose global sanctions against Iran and draw down its forces in Iraq.

Also at the embassy, Middle East analyst Dr. Aaron David Miller, Public Policy scholar at The Woodrow Wilson Centre said that further territorial disengagement by Israel cannot be unilateral, but should be based on a reciprocal agreement in order for the peace process to move forward.

Congresswoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz, the only Jewish female member of the U.S. Congress, described her proposed legislation to prohibit discrimination in life insurance policies based on foreign travel plans. Wasserman Schultz's application for extended coverage had been rejected by her own insurance company when she listed Israel as a possible travel destination. She is pushing for the bill to be passed in Congress, after passage of similar legislation in 10 states.

The day continued with a visit to the Israeli embassy where Lieutenant Colonel Ayal Bar-On explained Israel's defensive tactics during the war with Hezbollah this past summer and showed footage from the war proving that Hezbollah hid behind civilians.

"He is a man with a commitment to Israel and to democracy," said Krauthammer.

Toronto woman helps war's four-legged victims

People and animals assisted by generous donations

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA Federation

When Senta Hodes-Gilbert, a lifelong lover of animals, read about the hundreds of pets abandoned when their owners were forced to flee northern Israel for safer areas of the country during the recent war, she was distressed. "The people had to leave and couldn't take their pets with them," said Hodes-Gilbert. "They were in a terrible hurry to escape the rockets, thinking they might return in a little while, but of course that didn't happen, so the animals were just petrified, didn't know where their owners were, and the rockets injured and killed them."

So, in addition to her considerable donation to UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 that will be directed to helping the people of northern Israel, Hodes-Gilbert made a $25,000 gift to help the war's four-legged victims.

According to Hakol Chai, an organization dedicated to preventing and relieving animal suffering in Israel, the task now, expected to take months, is "to reunite animals placed in foster homes with their families, and to find homes for those without families or whose families cannot be located." Money is needed to cage, fence, and feed the animals in the meantime, as well as to provide veterinary and maintenance care.

A female bear rests at the entrance to the bomb shelter in Haifa zoo after many of the animals were released out of the shelters at the start of the war between Israel and Hezbollah to protect them from rocket strikes. The war resulted in the deaths of countless animals, both wildlife and pets left behind by families fleeing the war-zone in Northern Israel. (AP Photo/Muhammed Muheisen). (inset) Senta Hodes-Gilbert

Hodes-Gilbert, now in her eighties, was first introduced to animal causes in Israel in 1973. She was at a construction site, marveling over the buildings being erected "out of the ashes of Auschwitz" when she caught site of three donkeys - one pregnant - each with a "huge sack full of boulders on each side of the belly." The foreman ignored her complaints, but the experience prompted her to research animal welfare organizations in Israel, eventually leading her to the Jerusalem animal shelter, which she has supported ever since. She is involved as well with animal welfare in Canada. A vegetarian, Hodes-Gilbert attributes her love of animals to her parents, who belonged to a humane society in Germany and taught her from a young age "to be kind to animals because they also have feelings." Her appreciation for animals has grown throughout her life, and she is now an advocate of their therapeutic abilities. "Pets, especially for lonely people, are very comforting. They are something to love and to take care of," she says.

Hodes-Gilbert speaks enthusiastically about the Jewish tradition of compassion towards animals, citing as an example the requirement to feed one's pets before oneself. "There are two pages in Encyclopedia Judaica of rules that Jews have to protect animals... I'm so proud of the laws that we promulgated so long ago."

The gift by Hodes-Gilbert helped boost the UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 total to $60 million with $17.5 million designated for Israel's emergency needs.

Hana's Suitcase brings young audience to tears

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Review

If you're not sure how to tell your children about the horrors of the Holocaust, then there's someone here to help. Actually, there's an entire group of people – actors in an excellent performance of Hana's Suitcase who tackle this difficult topic with just the right amount of humility and compassion and do it in a way that children can understand.

Hana's Suitcase, originally a documentary by CBC producer Karen Levine, recounts the true story of two Japanese children and their teacher who go halfway around the world trying to find the owner of a piece of luggage that was donated to a Holocaust museum in Japan. Their search not only introduces them to Hana Brady, a 12-year-old girl who died in Auschwitz, but the students and their teacher learn about the Holocaust and what Jews, and more specifically, Jewish children went through.

In order to show the story of the search and of Hana's life, writer Emil Sher has written what seems like two plays that occur onstage simultaneously. As the Japanese children – who are played by twentysomethings – talk about how they're going to find out who the suitcase belongs to, Hana – played by Jessica Greenberg – appears on stage, walking around, sweeping and, basically, being a kid in prewar Europe. Although we see Hana during the first act, we don't hear from her.

The second act finally lets the Brady family tell their story. After Fumiko Ishioka, the teacher and museum curator, finds out Hana has a brother living in Toronto, she writes him asking to tell her what happened to his family during the Holocaust. George Brady writes back, and as Fumiko reads the letter, Greenberg and Paul Dunn, who plays the World War II-era George, relay Hana's life to the audience.

If that sounds pretty straightforward, that's because it is. Unlike The Diary of Anne Frank, in which we learn about the Holocaust through Anne's life in the attic, Hana's Suitcase basically spells out what happened to the Jews in World War II, and what happened to Hana. For adults, a lot of the dialogue will sound forced and the story line is fairly predictable, but children who aren't familiar with the Holocaust will be hooked early on.

The play is helped by some solid performances. Dale Yim plays Akira, an eager but hyperactive kid who can't sit still for a minute, and Ella Chan plays Maiko, Akira's more reserved and intellectual friend. Despite being young adults, the two play convincing students (well, at least the children in the audience will think so), and effortlessly push the story along. Greenberg is great, too, as she successfully gets across how confusing life must have been for children during the Holocaust.

Although this play is geared toward kids, it's still moving. Save for a few comedic moments (albeit juvenile ones), this is a deeply emotional play that had many of the children in the audience crying by the end. That is a testament to the play's directness – without leaving any details to the imagination, the younger audience members will easily pick up on how devastating Hana's story is. Of course, it's tough to hear a room full of kids cry, but this play is important for children to see, as Sher and director Allen MacInnis don't sugarcoat a thing.

Hana's Suitcase runs until Oct. 19 at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People, 165 Front St., Toronto. For tickets and showtimes, call 416-862-2222.

"ישראלי בניכר הוא כמו

B'nai mitzvah add to rite through twinning program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

David Weiser says his first "mitzvah" on becoming a bar mitzvah earlier this year was to keep alive the memory of a little boy named Willy.

Speaking on Sept. 26 at the second annual dinner for the Bar/Bat Mitzvah of Remembrance "Twinning Program" run by UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, Weiser said his June 17 bar mitzvah at Beth Torah Synagogue was "the most amazing experience," and that he believes being a "twin" made it much more meaningful.

Weiser is one of 84 teens who have gone through the program since its inception in 2002. Of those, 39 participated this year. All the students paired with Holocaust survivors who served as mentors and helped educate them about the children who perished in the Holocaust and never had the opportunity to celebrate their own bar or bat mitzvahs.

Weiser's "twin" was born in Holland, where Weiser has relatives. His mentor, Ronny Sweering, is a non-Jewish photographer in Amsterdam. As a nine-year-old in 1942, Sweering befriended Willy, an 11-year-old Jewish boy in hiding in the basement of his (Willy's) aunt's house, across the road from Sweering's.

Sweering visited Willy every day and gave him two white rabbits "to keep him from being lonely," Weiser said.

Willy and his aunt and uncle were taken away by the Nazis when Sweering was in the hospital for emergency surgery following an ear infection, Weiser said.

Sweering, who Weiser said is "a hero" to him, travels to schools in Holland with his wife, who wrote a book about his wartime experiences, to educate young people about the Holocaust and the dangers of prejudice.

"It's not an easy thing being a 'twin,'" said Eleanor Getzler, chair of the program, citing hours of research and learning about "a very painful part of our history."

"You are the witnesses to history, because in 30 years or so when my peers are not around and the survivor speakers are not around, you will be the voices… of these incredible stories," Lorraine Sandler, chair of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, told the youngsters at the event, which included a candlelighting ceremony to commemorate children of the Holocaust and their rescuers.

Remembrance, "painful as it maybe, [is] our source of determination, courage, strength and – above all– hope for the future," said mentor Peter Silverman, a former partisan whose parents and three brothers perished in 1941.

Mentor Julie Farago told The CJN that sharing her memories has not been easy, but that it's easier than it would have been 30 years ago.

Lisa Pinkus, the daughter of mentor Nate Leipciger and mother of Jordana, who participated in the program, told the group that as a result of the program, her whole family had a chance to learn about her late aunt.

"The deaths were a terrible tragedy, but it would be a worse tragedy if we didn't remember who they were in their short lives.

[Frances Kraft photos]

"The story of one person helps us understand that [the six million Holocaust victims represent] one person, six million times."

Participants in the program are mostly from Toronto and the surrounding area – where more than two dozen synagogues have supported the program – but there is one participant from Winnipeg, who found the program online.

NCSY celebrates 10 years in Thornhill

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Pool, pizza, web surfing and movies may not appear to be much more than typical fun for teenagers, yet these are some of the things that one organization offers so that high schoolers can get better connected Jewishly, and meet other Jewish teens.

It's been 20 years since the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) opened in Toronto, its first branch in Canada, in a small office space near Baycrest, with Rabbi Glenn Black taking the reins as the regional director of NCSY Canada six years later. The Thornhill location opened a few years after.

This month, NCSY will celebrate its 10th year in its Thornhill location, a 4,200-square-foot recreational area at the corner of Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue.

This location has given NCSY the impetus to make some giant strides in getting teens involved with Judaism, as has the opening of an Eglinton branch three years ago and six other locations in the Toronto area where they offer the free Torah high school. The Torah high school is a fully accredited after-school program that offers Hebrew-language and Jewish studies courses.

"Moving to Steeles and Bathurst was one of the best moves NCSY ever made," says Rabbi Black. "It's because the community was and is shifting north. When we moved to that corner, it wasn't as prominent, and it didn't play such a significant role in the Jewish community. We were almost there first, before the kosher restaurants, schools and shuls. We took a centre that was in fact too big for our needs, but now it's too small."

Touting itself as the largest Jewish youth organization in the country, NCSY offers programming that combines social, educational and spiritual perspectives. Black says that NCSY Canada was the first to have a place for kids to hang out, play pool, watch movies, use an on-site Internet café, order in pizza and hang out with Jewish kids.

"We opened up a drop-in centre, and that was also revolutionary. It's a free Jewish social club," says Rabbi Black.

The centre also hosts a homework club, where high schoolers can help junior high kids. Also offered are bar/ bat mitzvah programs. The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto recently conducted a continuity study that said that NCSY reaches over 27 per cent of 16,000 Jewish high schoolers in the Greater Toronto Area.

Although it is called the National Conference of Synagogue Youth, recent trends in the past 10 years have shown that teens are no longer found in synagogues, but found in public schools and private non-Jewish schools. "Really, in truth, it is now 'the national conference of school youth.' We've seen that to be a trend," says Rabbi Black.

Rabbi Binyamin Pinkus, director of senior programming, says NCSY is trying to attract new teens through a wide spectrum of programming. "We're just trying to get the word out to as many kids as we can, as fast as we can, because we all know about the ominous intermarriage rate," he says.

"We're trying to bring in as many unaffiliated teens as possible. We need to try new things, new tactics."

One of those "new things" NCSY is doing lately is buying up a third of the house for the upcoming Matisyahu concert at The Docks, on Oct. 22. "We are always looking for things that will reinterest secular and unaffiliated Jews in their [Jewish] roots, and Matisyahu is one of those bridges," says Rabbi Pinkus. "Connecting to kids who are otherwise estranged from Judaism might influence these kids to make Judaism relevant to their lives as well. A religious Jew as a rock star might get their attention. After all, we live in the iPod generation."

Besides concerts and classes, NCSY also programs major conventions, retreats and trips. Recently, it held a leadership Shabbaton conference at the Minsker Shul in Toronto's Kensington Market. In mid-November, NCSY's trip to New York hopes to attract 300 participants. Soon afterward, a ski trip will be in the works, as well as a trip to California.

In the last three years, Jewish Family and Child Services has been sponsoring a social worker to come in Monday nights and hang out with kids, or be there to talk about personal issues if they need to. Though many have walked through NCSY's doors inspired, Rabbi Pinkus recalls one story of a young Russian girl who went to public school and led an unaffiliated life, and became Jewishly aware as a result of NCSY. She lived with her father, who remarried a non-Jew, and who did not support her choices to bring Judaism in her life.

"Every holiday was a struggle," says Rabbi Pinkus, "During the High Holy Days, her family gave her a hard time. Yet she worked hard, and did her homework and tests in advance so she could celebrate the Jewish holy days."

Rabbi Pinkus recalls being told about her visit to a Jewish bookstore thinking: "I'm going to fill my house with these things because it's not what I had when I grew up."

Herb and Joyce Green have established an enviable record as prominent members of our community with deep roots in the support of Jewish education, welfare and particularly with an enduring love of Israel. They have been in the forefront of many events and campaigns in support of Israel and local organizations.

Jerry Rosenfield has served for over forty years as a Principal and as an Educational Consultant of several Jewish Day Schools in Greater Toronto, including Associated Hebrew Schools for 34 years, Yeshivas Nachalas Zvi and, most recently, Bnos Bais Yaakov High School. He is active in the Community as President of the Toronto Branch of Mizrachi and as Parnas/Chairman of the Religious Committee of Congregation Bnai Torah.

Beth Avraham Yoseph doubles its rabbinic staff

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

New assistant was born in Brantford, Ont.

Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT) has an assistant rabbi for the first time in its 25-year history.

Rabbi Chaim Yosef Ackerman, who took on the position Sept. 1, is focusing on the young adult segment of the 800-family congregation in Thornhill. He will also share responsibility for pastoral duties and life cycle events with Rabbi Baruch Taub, who has led the congregation since its inception, when it consisted of 13 member families.

Rabbi Ackerman, a 29-year-old father of four children aged two to seven, served most recently as spiritual leader of Congregation Torat Emet in Queens, N.Y.

He has a bachelor's degree in psychology from Touro College in New York and completed a certificate program in teaching at the Merkaz Lehachsharat Morim – Centre for Teacher Training in Queens.

Although he was raised in Baltimore, Rabbi Ackerman was born close to Toronto, in Brantford, Ont. His father, Rabbi Yitzchok Shmuel Ackerman served the small Jewish community in Brantford for a brief stint in the mid-1970s. The senior Ackermans now live in New York, where the elder Rabbi Ackerman does counselling and his wife Helen is a social worker.

The BAYT's Rabbi Ackerman is a former aspiring journalist who co-edited his high school yearbook and still "does a little bit of writing."

His life took a different direction, however, as he pursued post-high school studies in Israel, mostly at Yeshivat Chofetz Chaim in Jerusalem, where he spent three years.

Continuing his studies at Yeshivat Chofetz Chaim in New York, where the soft-spoken rabbi received his smichah, he realized that he loved being able to help people and interact with them on a daily basis. Also, he said, he has "an ability to listen" and he finds it fulfilling to serve people as a rabbi.

Rabbi Ackerman – who taught Jewish history, parshah and Jewish thought for three years at Shevach High School, an Orthodox girls' school in Queens – is putting his teaching skills to use in his new position, giving evening daf yomi classes and speaking at one of a half-dozen or so Shabbat morning minyanim at the shul.

Soon he will begin teaching beginner and intermediate Hebrew as part of the National Jewish Outreach Program's "Read Hebrew America/Canada" literacy campaign, as well as giving classes in the synagogue's "BAYT Medrash" Jewish learning program, and classes on Jewish thought on Shabbat afternoons.

In an article in the synagogue bulletin, Rabbi Taub was quoted as saying that Rabbi Ackerman is "an accomplished talmid chacham (Torah scholar) and possesses sterling midos (qualities)." He added that he is certain that Rabbi Ackerman's presence would "enhance the Torah development of our community immensely."

Rabbi Ackerman said he and his wife Menucha, who was born in Israel but raised in the United States, didn't find it hard to leave New York. "We're natural-born out-of-towners," he said, adding on a more serious note that they had always aspired to "more suburban living... We're very excited. We didn't need the hustle and bustle of New York City."

Among the things that appealed to Rabbi Ackerman about moving here was the "diversity under one roof" that he has found at the BAYT.

Referring to Shabbat afternoon youth groups that cover the Orthodox spectrum from Bnei Akiva (the youth arm of the religious Zionist Mizrachi movement) to National Conference of Synagogue Youth under the auspices of the Orthodox Union, to Pirchei and Bnos, which are associated with Agudah (a haredi movement), Rabbi Ackerman said, "they are not just functioning, they're really doing beautifully... It's very unique and beautiful that such a congregation can embrace all streams of Orthodoxy."

In Exile or at Home?

Reflections on the Jews, Israel and Anti-Semitism in an Uncertain World

Even after enduring and surviving several millennia, even at a time of statehood and prosperity, Israel and World Jewry struggle for a place among the nations in an unbalanced and precarious world. What will be now as genocidal Islamism is on the march? Does the West care and how will it respond? Four leading observers will reflect on these unavoidable questions. All lectures begin at 8 p.m.

Caregivers learn about survivors' special needs

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Seniors Scene

As Holocaust survivors age, they may have unique needs and exhibit behaviour that presents challenges for their caregivers.

For instance, as a result of traumatic experiences in concentration camps, some survivors are prone to hoarding food.

To help caregivers understand the reasons for such behaviour and learn strategies to cope with it, an educational session was held recently for staff at Comfort Keepers, a company that provides professional caregiving services across Canada.

"Holocaust survivors have their own unique aging needs, so we wanted to make sure our caregivers were addressing those needs," said Laurie Saunders, co-owner of Comfort Keepers, which provides in-home care, as well as assistance to people in hospitals and long-term care facilities.

Saunders enlisted the expertise of Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child Service, who gave an in-depth seminar and training session to a group of about 30 caregivers from Comfort Keepers.

"We helped them understand where the survivors were coming from as a result of their Holocaust experiences and gave them specific tips to hopefully engender a positive outcome," Rabbi Weiss said.

For example, Rabbi Weiss informed the caregivers that the Nazis frequently shouted or spoke very loudly to concentration camp prisoners.

Consequently, hearing loud voices may trigger flashbacks for survivors.

"Whenever caregivers speak to someone having a flashback, they have to be mindful to speak softly and in a compassionate voice... This will help calm them, " Rabbi Weiss said.

The rabbi also noted that certain odours and noises, such as the scent of antiseptic or the sound of a dog barking, can also prompt agitated behaviour.

Gaining insight into these triggers will help caregivers appreciate and be more sensitive to survivors' behaviour, the rabbi said.

Some other situations that are occasionally troublesome for elderly survivors include being in a dark or confined space.

"Darkness and confined spaces can be frightening," Saunders said. "So leaving lights on and ensuring the door isn't shut when someone is in a room is a good coping strategy."

Both Saunders and Rabbi Weiss stressed that these situations can become more intense for survivors who have dementia and Alzheimer disease.

The rabbi also taught the caregivers about Jewish customs and beliefs, and he showed a video that provided a history lesson on the Holocaust and a discussion on caring for survivors today.

"The video is very effective," Rabbi Weiss said. "It gives a historical context and then shifts to the professional health care mode today with scenes at a long-term care facility."

Saunders said the seminar was practical and helpful.

"The caregivers now understand the context of why some survivors act in a certain way, and that understanding will enhance the bond between our caregivers and their clients," she said.

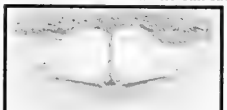
Jewish Life

Sukkot: the season of our rejoicing

By RABBI ZUSHE SILBERSTEIN

On Sukkot, we are commanded to leave our homes and live in small huts. Our sages explain the rationale for this mitzvah, stating that the huts recall the Clouds of Glory that protected the Jews during their journey through the desert after their exodus from Egypt.



Rabbinic Reflections

What is the point of the resemblance? The sukkah huts must be frail structures, unable to provide real support against the elements. In such a dwelling, a person is dependent on God. That is precisely the message of the Clouds of Glory. They encompassed the Jews entirely as they proceeded through the desert, protecting them and clearing all the obstacles in their path. Similarly, in our own individual journeys through life, no matter how strong our situation appears, we are living in frail huts, dependent on God's protection and guidance.

Sukkot is "the season of our rejoicing." One might think that knowing that we are dependent only on God would produce an attitude of uncertainty and nervousness. After all, everyone likes to feel that they are standing on firm ground and that they are in control of their future. Nevertheless, in truth, the knowledge that we do not control our future and that everything is in God's hands is the most satisfying and joyful message we can have. For man is by definition limited and there are limits to the good that he can fathom. God, by definition, is unlimited and can provide man with a good far greater than he could possibly conceive of on his own.

Following Sukkot is Simchat Torah, when we rejoice with the Torah. The previous Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Joseph Isaac Schneersohn, would explain that the name Simchat Torah means "The happiness of the Torah." The Torah is happy and wants to dance, but since it has no feet of its own, it can't. A Jew takes the Torah in hand and becomes its feet. This completes the process that we began on Rosh Hashanah. On Rosh Hashanah, we dedicated ourselves to God with homage to His sovereignty, and on Simchat Torah, we rejoice in the fact that we have merged our own identities with that of the Torah.

In a personal sense, that means we allow the Torah to define who we are and what we want to do. This is the greatest happiness, knowing that we have placed our personalities – not only our fate (as on Sukkot) – in God's hands and that He will help us grow and develop in the most complete way possible.

The celebrations of Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah are a foretaste of the ultimate celebrations that will accompany the coming of the Mashiach, when, "crowned with eternal joy," we will proceed to Eretz Yisrael in the ultimate Redemption.

All of the stages of Divine service of the High Holy Days will be experienced at that time: Mashiach will be a king and he will lift us to a level of spiritual awareness that will evoke complete devotion to God. This in turn will inspire tshuvah, sincere regret over any misdeeds that we performed and more importantly, a desire to identify with the fundamental Godly spark that lies at the core of our being. And there will be the great joy and satisfaction of seeing this all become manifest.

At present, our experience of spirituality is primarily intellectual, and there are rare times when we can also lift our feelings above the material and sense these concepts, but in the era of Mashiach, all of this will be actual. The concepts that today we accept on faith and appreciate on the level of thought will then be experienced as tangible reality.

That 'other' Jew? He's not me!

By ELLIOT MALAMET

At the core of the thought of the French philosopher Emmanuel Levinas is the idea of "the other," usually pertaining to either the infinite other, God, or simply to the human being who is not us. Levinas not only delves into the responsibility we have to understand and embrace the other but also on the way we often maintain our own sense of identity by harshly casting out others through methods of exclusion and the creation of hierarchy.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Two recent incidents reminded me of Levinas.

In a classroom discussion at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto about strategies contemporary Jews use to confront or negotiate with modernity, a student of mine – a very nice kid, by the way – blurted out that, in his estimation, haredi Jews are "out of touch with reality." His summation was grounded in the perception that many haredim have no place for television or the Internet in their lives, and they shun certain kinds of western social obsessions.

Suffice it to say, though not haredi myself, I found this comment very troubling. So, on the heels of this remark, I proposed the following choice to several of my classes: if you could marry only one or the other of the following, whom would it be: a haredi Jew or a gentile? I asked the students to seek out their parents' response, as well as to answer the question themselves.

The results of this impromptu poll were noteworthy. Of a sample of approximately 80 students, the findings were remarkably consistent. More than 90 per cent of their parents opted for them marrying a haredi Jew, even knowing that this would entail a radical shift in the child's religious observance. But when the students offered their own answer, more than 80 per cent preferred, in this scenario, to marry the gentile.

Around the same time, I had a separate conversation with a haredi man I know who said, that truth be told, many secular Jews basically lead their lives as de facto gentiles and that he doesn't relate to them at all. When I asked if he had ever invited such Jews to his Shabbat or Yom Tov table, he answered in the negative, saying that he didn't want to expose his family to those kinds of pernicious influences.

I don't have any quick analysis of these disparate, yet related, incidents, but I can't shake the feeling that they're fuelled by a sense of total otherness – and perhaps even revulsion that both my student and my haredi companion mutually feel. They gaze at the other – from a distance — and can't see themselves mirrored in any way. But ironically, if you were to speak to either one alone, you would find shared characteristics – a fundamental decency, kind hearts and a sense that both are trying to learn and grow as people.

The demonization of the other is not particular to any one faith community or ideological position. Pierre Rehov, a French filmmaker whose upcoming film Suicide Killers examines the pathology of such individuals, notes that currently, certain Muslims believe that theirs "is the only true religion and there is no room, in their mind, for interpretation."

We as Jews would be well served to draw wise conclusions from this tragic state of affairs, perhaps most poignantly in relation to ourselves.

Jewish Life

Thanksgiving and Sukkot

This year the Canadian observance of Thanksgiving occurs during the Sukkot festival. Both holidays, despite evident differences, partake of similar concerns and values.

Thanksgiving, like Sukkot, offers us a true perspective on our possessions. It serves to remind us that they are given to us in trust, to use not only for our own pleasures and gratification but also in the service of others. Gratitude at its highest goes beyond counting blessings. It involves sharing blessings. It talks not only of indebtedness to be acknowledged but also of debts to be discharged. It takes us beyond saying thanks to giving thanks.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This, after all, is what we really mean when we say "much obliged." We mean that we are much obligated, we have incurred a debt that we are duty bound to repay. What is involved is not generosity but common honesty.

Did you ever as a child come home bursting with some good news only to find the house empty, no one there to hear and share it? What a letdown! The keen edge of joy is dulled if we have to keep it to ourselves. Thankfulness serves that same purpose of adding to the meaning and blessings of what we have received. If there were no one to thank, life would be poor indeed.

If we can't be thankful for what we receive, we should be thankful for what we escape. A wise woman has expressed this thought in the following words:

Today, upon a bus I saw a girl with golden hair./ She seemed so glad, I envied her, and wished that I was half so fair./ I watched her as she rose to leave, and saw her hobble down the aisle./ She had one leg and wore a crutch, but as she passed – a smile./ Oh God, forgive me when I whine: I have two legs and the world is mine./ Two legs to take me where I go,/ Two eyes to see the sunset's glow,/ Two ears to hear all that I should know./ Oh God, forgive me when I whine;/ I'm blessed indeed, the world is mine.

Some years ago Rabbi Robert Kahn delivered a sermon titled "Leftover Turkey." His main point was that the joy of a thanksgiving family gathering is usually followed the next day by a menu that is likely to be cold sliced turkey, turkey salad or turkey hash. He went on to say that life has something of this quality.

So often our joy is followed by sorrow, our days give way to night, our happiness succeeded by problems, and for every turkey we enjoy, there is leftover turkey the day after. One day our home is full of childish laughter and the joys of growing up, and then off they go to college, to marriage, and the house is quiet and empty and our hearts are lonely!

One day we are young and healthy and full of the sap of life, and the next, it's the doctor's office or the hospital, and we must live out our lives with aches and pains and sometimes much worse. One day we sit hand in hand with those we love, and the next, they are snatched away and we are left with only our memories to warm the hearthstones of our hearts.

When life is kind, when the sun shines warmly and everyone around us shares our love, it's not hard to smile and be cheerful, but when the darkness comes at midday, or when the days get short and the weather turns rainy and cold, when all we have is leftovers, what then, what then?

Life is not all leftovers. To have leftover turkey for dinner tonight, you had to have turkey yesterday. Life has its ups and downs, its triumphs and defeats, its sweetness along with its bitterness. Let us savour the golden days when the sun shines; let us enjoy the laughter when it fills our homes; let us rejoice in the health we have; let us be happy in the freedom and peace in which we live. For it is in the joyful times of life that we store up the memories and the hopes with which to face its sorrows.

In this spirit and with this sure knowledge, let us be prepared for both sunshine and rain, for joy and pain, hoping that one day there will be a universal Sukkot, in which humankind will come of age, and history be fulfilled.

Hoshanah Rabbah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You start the evening by enjoying a festive meal that includes a couple of kreplach. The next morning, you make seven circuits around the synagogue, lulav and etrog in hand. And then you perform a ritual unlike any other during the Jewish year: you take some willow branches and give the floor a good thwacking. Although Hoshanah Rabbah may sometimes be overlooked on the trek from Sukkot to Shmini Atzeret, the mystical day plays an important role reminiscent of Yom Kippur. [http://tinyurl.com/k2kuj]

According to the Virtual Jerusalem site, the reason for striking the floor with those willow branches is "hidden to all but a few." [http://tinyurl. com/p3td9] Rabbi Yisroel Miller quotes from the holiday text, which says that causing the leaves to fall away symbolizes "the falling away of the sparks of Divine Judgment; and we cast it away as an end to the Days of Judgment." For an explanation of just what that really means, see Rabbi Miller's essay Beating the Branches. [http://tinyurl.com/z7s7v]

Although Hoshanah Rabbah is considered a special day, it does not share the same work prohibitions as other Jewish holidays. That's why you can watch an online video taken of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach as he conducted a two-hour Hoshanah Rabbah service at New York City's Congregation Kehilath Jacob. (The video quality is not great but is still well worth viewing.) [http://tinyurl.com /hhyj5]

You can get a very different feel for the day by listening to a Yemenite congregation reciting the central, hypnotic refrain of the day, "Hoshanah. Ana HaShem Hoshiah Na" – please save. Please, God, save now. [http://tinyurl.com/k4adc]

Earlier, I mentioned that the reason for beating the hoshanahs is hidden to all but a few. Well, the folks at Ohr Somayach don't seem to be in the know, but that hasn't stopped them from giving us a Top Ten List of the wrong reasons for hitting hoshanahs on the floor. A sampling: to punish the floor; to punish the synagogue janitor; because speaking to the floor isn't giving us water; and because hitting our heads against the floor is too painful. [http://tinyurl.com/z6d9d]

On Hoshanah Rabbah, the chazzan wears white and chants prayers using Yom Kippur tunes. The Ohr Somayach site quotes a midrash in which God says to Abraham, "I will give your descendants a special day for forgiveness: Hoshanah Rabbah. If they are not forgiven on Rosh Hashanah, then let them try Yom Kippur; if not, then Hoshanah Rabbah." [http://tinyurl.com/nj5lb]

Yom Kippur and Hoshanah Rabbah have something else in common – kreplach. In honour of both holidays, we eat those triangular pockets of dough with meat or other stuffing. As Robin Treistman explains, "the word, 'kreplach' is Yiddish and is said to be derived from the Hebrew names of the holidays on which this food is eaten: before or after Yom Kippur (K), Hoshanah Rabbah (R) and Purim (P). These holidays are connected to one another because they involve some sort of striking or beating: on Yom Kippur we beat our heart in prayer; on Hoshanah Rabbah we beat willow branches and on Purim we beat (and blast and cream and clobber) Haman." [http://tinyurl.com/hm2zw]

All three holidays share another theme – atonement. Because of divine atonement, we were saved during the days of Mordechai and Esther. On Yom Kippur eve, we recite the Viddui – confession in expectation of our atonement. And "on Hoshanah Rabbah we have high hopes that such atonement has been granted." [http://tinyurl.com/jym2f] The Nishmas site suggests that judgment (symbolized by meat) is clothed in kindness (symbolized by the dough). [http://tinyurl.com /h5lvh]

Now that you know the reason, you can take your pick of 13 kreplach recipes in the Jewish Food Archives including beef, chicken liver, kasha and cheese. [http://tinyurl.com/fgggs] If you still haven't had your fill, the RFCJ Recipe Archive includes ones with spinach and shiitake mushrooms. [http://tinyurl. com/6ms5n]

As the day winds down, we bid farewell to Sukkot and prepare to usher in Shemini Atzeret. But before that, don't forget to wish family and friends the special greeting of the day: a gutten kvittel (Yiddish) or pikta tava (Aramaic), literally, may you merit "a good note" of God's judgment. [http://tinyurl.com/jxteh]

UJA Federation announces nominees

Leslie Gales, nominations committee chair for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced the nominees for the board of directors and individual representatives to council.

Elections will be held during UJA Federation's annual meeting on Monday Nov. 27, at 7:30 p.m.

In accordance with the by-laws, the governance consists of a council, a board of directors and an executive committee. The board of directors will be elected by the members of the council; the executive committee will be elected by the board of directors from among the directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following by-laws:

"Only members of the federation who have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal in respect of the previous year, and are in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal, shall be eligible to serve as an individual or group representative on the council.

"Any 20 representatives may nominate any individual member of the federation for election to the board of directors and the positions of chair and vice-chair, provided that: (a) any one individual representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the board of directors; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of council.

"Any seven members may nominate any individual member of the federation for election to the council provided that: (a) any one member may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the council; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of council."

Nominated for chair of the board is David Engel and vice-chair of the Board is David Koschitzky. Nominees for the board of directors include: Natan Aronshtam, Jodi Bager, Barbara Bank, Austin Beutel, Lesley Binstock Offman, Peter Cohen, Stephen Cole, Richard Diamond, Sheldon Disenhouse, Peter Ekstein, David Engel, Sherry Firestone, Leslie Gales, Leo Goldhar, Sheldon Goodman, Toddy Granovsky, Alison Himel, Marshall Kesten, Warren Kimel, David Koschitzky, Joseph Lebovic, Glennie Lindenberg, Baila Lubek, Steve Mayer, Berl Nadler, Neil Nisker, Morris Perlis, Elan Pratzer, Greta Reiss, Ariella Rohringer, Honey Sherman, Randy Shiff, Eileen Silver, Ted Sokolsky, Richard Venn, Mark Waldman, Alan Winer, Elizabeth Wolfe, Henry Wolfond, Liora Yakubowicz, and Cecile Zaifman.

The following individual representatives are to be elected for a two-year term, 2005-2007, to the federation council: Lorne Abony, Cheryl Appleby Jackson, Sandra Atlin, Marlene Axmith, Arna Banack, Tobie Bekhor, Marc Benjamin, Donald Bennett, David W. Brown, Sandra Brown, Vicki Campbell, Robert Cherniak, Jack Chisvin, Karen Chisvin, Jeffrey I. Cohen, Roz Davidson, Yale Drazin, Anita Ekstein, Susan Fenwick, Bernard S. Fishbein, Abe Glowinsky, Brian J. Goldberg, Jill Goldberg-Reitman, Jeffrey Goldfarb, Harry Gorman, Shawna Granovsky, Abraham J. Green, Louis I. Greenbaum, Judy Gwartz, Michael Halbert, Susan J. Harris, Genya Intrator, Lynn Kirshin, Leslie M. Klein, Henry Koschitzky, Stanley Kugelmass, Ruth Ladovsky, Judy Libman, Howard Lichtman, Thomas Lobel, Agi Mandel, Pamela S. Medjuck, Howard Meyer, Eleanor Mintz, Paul G. Morton, Jeffrey Olin, Gilbert Palter, Elliott Peranson, Gerald Richler, Gerald Ross, Sheila Rother, Alan M. Sandler, Michael Serruya, Laurie Sheff, Marlene Sklar, Arthur Stern, Raymond H. Stone, Kenneth M. Tanenbaum, Cyrel Troster, and George Wasserstein.

In addition to the individual representatives listed, each group member of the federation shall be entitled to two representatives on the council (group representatives). Any group member which has membership in good standing in excess of 100 people residing in the Greater Toronto Area shall be entitled to one additional group representative on the council. "Group" means any charitable, educational, social, cultural, religious or recreational agency, organization or congregation, unincorporated or incorporated (without share capital) whose activities are carried out primarily in the Greater Toronto Area (including the main Greater Toronto Area branch or division of national organizations), having a Jewish membership of at least 25 people, or such other agency or organization which may be accepted by the directors.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is in the process of completing a corporate reorganization for the purpose of better aligning its corporate structure with its operations and governance model. As part of this reorganization, we have incorporated a new not-for-profit corporation. At the annual general meeting, the members of the federation will be asked to approve the continuance of federation's operations under the new corporation. A by-law, similar to the federation's constitution, will govern the operations of the new corporation.

Members interested in reviewing this by-law may request a copy by calling 416-635-2883, ext. 306, or by e-mailing rgoldberg@ujafed.org.

If you have questions or comments prior to the annual general meeting, please call the federation's general counsel, Mark S. Anshan, at 416-631-5834, or contact him by e-mail at manshan@ujafed.org.

Shortening the length of shul services: a modest proposal

By MURRAY TEITEL

Guest Voice

On the second day of Rosh Hashanah, with the end of the shul service nowhere in sight, I looked at my watch and casually observed that it was 1:10 p.m. and about three quarters of the congregation had already gone home.

About an hour and a half earlier, the rabbi had started his sermon. Among the issues he would eloquently touch upon in the next 45 minutes there figured prominently the one about shul-goers who only show up on the High Holy Days and never come on Shabbat. I'm sure all of you, wherever you attended, heard some variation on that theme.

Rabbis give various reasons for the lack of regular Shabbat attendance which, for the most part, have to do with "defects" in their congregants. For instance, rabbis will say, congregants aren't spiritual, but are more interested in fulfilling temporary gratifications such as playing golf or water skiing, or they can't read Hebrew so they can't follow the service, etc.

It doesn't occur to these rabbis that many of the people who don't come regularly understand the prayers perfectly well, don't have cottages, hate golf and would like to come to shul. The reason they don't come is that the services are just so long and so geshlept that they can't sit through them. This lack of attendance will only get worse as a new generation of worshippers with Sesame Street-length attention spans takes (or doesn't take) its place in the pews.

This lack of attendance will only get worse

I love asking gentiles about the first time they attended a bar or bat mitzvah. They get invitations asking them to join the parents at services beginning at 9 a.m. and, being nice, polite, punctual, considerate gentiles who would never be disrespectful to anyone, they actually arrive at 9 a.m.! Of course, they are the only ones there. The gentiles can't imagine that there are people on earth would actually have religious services that last three hours. Who knows how many times they've been mistakenly counted as part of a minyan? The Jewish guests, knowing that the service will last until at least 12:30, time their arrivals accordingly.

Why do you think we have a kiddush after shul? Because if it weren't for that herring tidbit on a Tam Tam cracker mit a shtikel honey cake, Bathurst Street on a Saturday afternoon would be littered with Jews who collapsed trying to make their way home after sitting through a 3½-hour service.

Services don't have to last that long. Shortening them would not be disrespectful to God. I, myself, had an epiphany about this at age 18, when I spent Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur with my uncle and aunt in Hibat Zion, Israel, a village inhabited by mainly Orthodox Jewish farmers and their families who took worshipping God very seriously. Yet even on Yom Kippur, we were out before noon.

Shabbat attendance would greatly increase if services ended at 11 a.m., or 11:15 if there is a bar or bat mitzvah (because it takes 15 minutes to throw candies at them, listen to their five minute dvar torah – funny the way strict time limits are imposed on the kids but no one else – and present them with their The Jewish Book of Why and JNF pin).

How can this be achieved? Through strict time limits. Cantors should be permitted no more than four minutes for Musaf Kedushah. Ask any congregant whether she prefers to sing along communally to a tune that's been around since my Talmud Torah junior congregation days or listen to a cantor dray on and on, and she will tell you the former.

Rabbis should be permitted a maximum 10-minute introduction to the Torah portion, and they should deliver their sermons after the service is over. Those who want to leave should be allowed to do so without being made to feel guilty, even if they are off to play golf, because it's better that they come to shul and miss the sermon than not come at all.

Those who leave before the sermon would not get kiddush, but those who stay for the sermon or a learning session should be treated to a deluxe one with scotch, Israeli wines, party sandwiches, potato kugel or cholent and Israeli dips in addition to the herring tidbits, Tam Tams and honey cake – because, God knows, they will have earned it.

Jewish 'ambassador' urges religious role in peace process

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Orthodox rabbi who is mandated to act as world Jewry's "ambassador" to other religions told an international conference here that political leaders in the Middle East have made a "fatal and tragic error" in not recognizing the religious dimension to the conflict.

"There is a tendency to see religion as part of the problem and, therefore, to have nothing to do with it… They say you religious people keep away, you only make problems and mess things up," said Rabbi David Rosen, president of the Jerusalem-based International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations, the umbrella organization that represents Jews in their relations with other religions

"But that is a fallacy. It fails to understand how profound religious identity is to the people involved. It can't be ignored. If we don't want religion to be the problem, we have to make it part and parcel of the solution."

Rabbi Rosen was speaking a plenary session of World's Religions After September 11: A Global Congress, a five-day conference that drew 2,000 participants from 35 countries, representing more than 20 faiths and practices.

He noted that in 1993, when Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin shook hands on the White House lawn, "there was not one identifiable Palestinian Muslim religious figure or identifiable Israeli Jewish religious figure there."

The exclusion of religion from the Oslo process may have led to the dangerous "religionization" of the renewed conflict that he said has taken place over the past six years. Religion is now being exploited to exacerbate the situation, when it could have been harnessed as a constructive force, Rabbi Rosen suggested.

Today, religious extremists are the ones who are being heard, he said. Political leaders should give moderate religious voices a place in the search for a solution, he said.

"Our spiritual identity should be seen as a blessing and not a curse. After 9/11, I think there is a glimmer of understanding of that," he said.

Rabbi Rosen was an initiator of the Alexandria Summit, held in Egypt four years ago, the first time Muslim, Jewish and Christian leaders came together to approach the Middle East from an interfaith perspective. It had the endorsement of "two enemies" Arafat and Ariel Sharon, as well as the blessing of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, whom Rabbi Rosen described as having been "hostile" to introducing any religious element until then.

The British-born Rabbi Rosen, a former chief rabbi of Ireland, said it's rare to find an Orthodox rabbi engaged in interreligious activity at any level, and that he is "the subject of a great deal of criticism within my own community."

Among his many achievements is being a founder of Rabbis for Human Rights. "I'm criticized not because I care about Arab human rights, but because I'm working together with Reform rabbis," he said.

"This is the type of internecine nonsense that we have to move beyond. Sometimes I'm asked why I'm spending so much time with non-Jews. Well, it's often much easier and nicer… It's an easier task to be a foreign minister rather than a minister for home affairs."

He does see some progress, however. "We managed to involve the whole spectrum of Orthodox rabbis and even ultra-Orthodox rabbis at the international conference of rabbis and imams [held in Seville earlier this year]. Many had never before met a person of a different faith."

Rabbi Rosen believes that people of different religions have no choice but to dialogue, and that the three Abrahamic religions, and most Eastern religions, call upon their adherents to be "merciful and compassionate."

He conceded that this is easier said than done.

"When people feel wounded, it is more difficult for them to be compassionate. The answer is to treat them with more compassion, in order that they overcome their woundedness and sense of alienation," he said.

He stressed that everyone in the Middle East sees themselves as a victim. "The Palestinians feel vulnerable to Israeli power. Israelis feel vulnerable in a sea of Arab hostility of which the Palestinians are fifth-columnists," and the Arab world feels demeaned and threatened by western culture and the failures of its own leadership.

"Everyone is waiting for the other side to take the initiative."

Rabbi Rosen said the people of the region must overcome the "zero-sum mentality" that support for one's own group or partisan position requires insensitivity to others.

While it's true that the Torah gives Jews title to the land of Israel, Rabbi Rosen said, it does not confer the right to suppress the rights of others. "That is against the fundamental principles of the Torah," he said.

A democratic and Jewish state is not a contradiction, he argued. "In fact, if it was not democratic it could not be Jewish. The Torah makes clear that every person is made in the divine image and affirms the dignity of each person."

Despite the ongoing conflict, Rabbi Rosen noted that interfaith activity is flourishing in Israel. He is a founder of the Interreligious Coordinating Council in Israel, which embraces about 70 organizations involved in interfaith relations. He said there should be more outside support for these activities.

Rabbi Rosen is also an international president of the World Conference of Religion for Peace, which incorporates 15 religions in over 50 countries.

Clinton to speak at Ottawa JNF Negev Dinner

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Former U.S. president Bill Clinton will be the keynote speaker at Ottawa's 2006 Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner in honour of Stephen Victor.

The sold-out event will be held Nov. 8 at the Westin Hotel.

Victor, a prominent lawyer, has a long history of civic involvement in both Ottawa's Jewish and general communities.

Born and raised in the city, he has always been proud of his heritage and happy to do whatever he could to help his people.

"I wear my Jewishness on my sleeve. It is an important part of my persona, and since my early teens, I recognized the importance of Israel to the survival of the Jewish people and I believe, therefore, in a very strong Israel," he said.

"Israel must be supported by the Jewish people in the Diaspora in order to maintain the strength of the Jewish people and the strength of Israel."

A Camp B'nai Brith alumnus, Victor was its youngest-ever camp director at age 24. Since then, he has held numerous leadership roles in the community, serving as president of Ottawa's jewish community centre; president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa and chair of United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa. Nationally, he was chair of the Canada-Israel Committee and national president of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Victor has also served as chairman of the Ottawa Heart Institute's foundation board. Dr. Wilbert Keon, a former head of the institute, said that Victor's "tremendous social conscience" has "kept him involved and active in a number of charities and with people in need."

At Victor's request, proceeds from the 2006 Negev Dinner will be used to establish the Stephen and Gail Victor Botanical Garden at Hebrew University's Mount Scopus campus.

"This project combines both of my passions," Victor said. "I am able to raise money for a project at the Mount Scopus campus for one of the passions in my life, Hebrew University, and also to support an organization [JNF] which reclaimed the barren land."

He said that the "garden will be an oasis of tranquility in a turbulent Middle East" and "will be there permanently, to show that the Jewish people will not be moved, that the State of Israel will be there forever."

Brosh reflects on time in Canada

"[The technology] is not American, but I believe that they regard it as American. The company has two factories, one in Atlanta and one in Israel. So, they probably sell it as an American product," Brosh said.

Brosh also spoke about his involvement with the newly formed Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, an organization meant to encourage Canadians to invest and trade with Israel, a country that, according to the World Economic Forum Report, has the 15th strongest economy in the world. In fact, Israel was ranked one place higher than Canada.

He said that given the strength of both economies, there is no reason why the United States invests 27 times more in Israel than Canada does, and he hopes the new chamber will help boost Canada's disproportionate rate of investment.

Although some of the consulate's initiatives were pushed aside to deal with the Israel-Hezbollah war last summer, he said he is confident that, with the continued financial and administrative support of CIC and other Jewish organizations, he will fulfil his responsibility of exposing Canadians to all that the country has to offer.

Brosh said the consulate was instrumental in bringing Maccabi Tel Aviv to play the Toronto Raptors basketball team last year.

He explained that two years ago, New York's consul general met with NBA Commissioner David Stern to speak about bringing the Israeli team to play in North America. Brosh got in touch with Larry Tannenbaum, the chairman of the board of Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment Ltd., which owns the Raptors, and Tannenbaum agreed to host the team in Toronto.

In the end, Maccabi Tel Aviv played only in Toronto and Florida, and both games were arranged by the Raptors' management.

"We were so proud because... no other consulate could arrange it. All over North America, there are eight consulates and we're the only consulate that did it," Brosh said, adding that the team is returning to play the Raptors in Toronto this month.

He said that with these initiatives, he doesn't expect the average Canadian will disregard all the negative images about Israel projected by the media, but he hopes that when Canadians do think of Israel, they will think of the positive contributions Israel has made to the world as well.

"We want to deepen these relations and ... strengthen Israel, not by giving donations so much, but by really being there and investing there," he said adding that not everyone has the means to invest.

"But if you go as a tourist, you are investing. You're putting money in the hotels and you are helping to create jobs, [stimulate] the economy. It also enriches you as a person. [Israel] is not something virtual or spiritual. It is a state – and it is a good place to vacation."

Book takes lighthearted look at Alzheimer disease

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It may be hard to imagine that there's a lighter side to Alzheimer disease, but an Ottawa woman dealing with her mother's illness has found it and she's found an innovative way to help others to see it, too.

Barbara Schulman and her two longtime friends Beverly Grostern and Donna Lorden have recently published a book titled Dancing in the Elevator: A Compilation of Anecdotes about Life with Alzheimer Disease, a collection of stories gathered from 11 contributors, including caregivers, spouses and family members of Alzheimer patients.

"Often you think you are alone when going through things, [but] these stories have aspects which people will identify with and find comfort from… there are ways to look at it in a more positive perspective," Schulman said.

The title for the book comes from its first story, Schulman's own, which describes a difficult day of medical appointments with her mother that ended with her mother's spontaneous dance in the elevator to her apartment, having completely forgotten the stressful events of the day.

Having shared her experiences for years with her friends, Schulman decided it might be a good idea to share them with others. Grostern and Lorden enthusiastically agreed to help, each bringing her own skills and strengths to the project: Lorden enjoys writing, while Grostern became the project's fundraiser. All the costs of producing the book were covered by donations, with the goal of donating all proceeds to the Alzheimer Society of Ottawa.

"As our work unfolded, we all brought certain strengths to the book… there was a lot more work than we ever anticipated, but it was a natural way to progress… each of us had her own respective responsibilities. We also supported each other," Schulman said.

"It was really a labour of love and a learning experience and lots of fun for all of us," said Grostern. "We were so impressed with how other people came forward and offered their skills… when they heard there were jobs to be done."

So many people came forward with stories that the trio had difficulty choosing only 11 and felt they had enough material for a second book. Only two contributors wished to remain anonymous. Although the stories are light and often humorous, they don't poke fun at a serious subject.

"All of the stories were very respectful," Grostern said. "They get a laugh but not at anyone's expense."

In addition to raising money for the Alzheimer Society, the secondary goal of the book is to raise awareness about the disease. The slim, attractive book features a forget-me-not flower on its cover, the symbol of the Alzheimer Society.

The women are now focusing their energies on publicity and selling the book, which was recently launched at the annual general meeting of the Alzheimer Society of Ottawa. It's available in Ottawa bookstores and online at www.alzheimerottawa.org. In addition, Schulman and Grostern, both former Montrealers, travel frequently to Montreal and say they'd be happy to deliver books there. Grostern can be reached at 613-729-0561.

Record number of students visit Holocaust museum

Asper program set new record this spring

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Asper Foundation's Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program has had a record-breaking year for student and community participation.

The foundation, in partnership with other organizations, sent 800 participants from 18 cities – the largest number in the program's history – to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. this spring. More than 4,000 students have visited the museum since the program began in 1997.

"We successfully increased our national reach by 60 per cent over last year," said Jeff Morry, the Asper Foundation's senior program manager. "Our program is now being offered in 78 cities and communities across the country."

In the program's first year, Grade 8 students from the Winnipeg Jewish community's Gray Academy visited the museum. The program was then expanded to Jewish Grade 9 students attending other city schools and later to allow Grade 9 students in the general population in Winnipeg and across Canada to participate.

The program aims to promote tolerance and to sensitize Canadian high school students to the consequences of racism. A significant portion of the costs are borne by the Asper Foundation.

In 2004, the Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program received an award from the Canadian Human Rights Commission in recognition of its creative means of advancing and protecting human rights and working to address racism in our communities.

Before students visit the Holocaust museum, they take a course, given over 18 hours, on human rights and the Holocaust, with emphasis on American history, the civil rights movement and human rights in the world today.

Students are required to volunteer in their communities when they return from Washington. The final component of the program is a graduation ceremony.

"Canadians strongly believe in upholding the rights of people in our own country and around the world. This is evident from the impressive growth in this special program across Canada," said Babs Asper, co-founder of the Asper Foundation.

The Asper Foundation is spearheading the establishment of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights in Winnipeg, which was inspired by the impact of the Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program. The museum is projected to be the largest human rights institution and centre for education in the world today.

The program will be expanded in the coming years and will sponsor tens of thousands of high school students and their chaperones from across Canada on visits to the Washington Holocaust museum each year.

The Asper Foundation recently launched a website for its Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program at www.humanrights.asperfoundation.com.

"The site will be a wonderful opportunity for past and present program students, families and administrators/chaperones across the country to share their thoughts in password-protected chatrooms and post photos, and for people to get general information on the program," Morry said.

TARTS FOR ISRAEL: Grade 8 and senior kindergarten students at Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom Campus went on a trip last month and picked hundreds of apples that the Grade 8 students later used to bake apple crumble tarts. Some 200 of the tarts were later sold in a "sell-a-thon" that raised more than $1,000 for families in Haifa who were affected by the recent war with Hezbollah.

Schulich funds music scholarship, award at McGill

MONTREAL — As an encore to last year's $20-million donation to McGill University's school of music, Toronto mining magnate Seymour Schulich is funding the $20,000 Golden Violin award to encourage promising young musicians.

The annual scholarship comes with a gold-plated pewter violin, valued at $100,000, which Schulich unveiled in a recent ceremony at McGill.

The first recipient of the award is violinist Emmanuel Vukovich, a fourth-year student at the Schulich School of Music, as the school was renamed after the businessman's donation. The ornamental violin will be kept on permanent display in McGill's Marvin Duchow Music Library.

The Golden Violin award is the richest privately funded music scholarship in Canada. Candidates are top string players who are close to completing their studies at McGill and have demonstrated the potential to embark on a successful performing career. Recipients are chosen by the McGill scholarships committee.

"When I saw it, I got very excited," said Schulich. "I thought, if you go to a music school and you want to have competition, what could be more appropriate than this violin? My idea was to create an equivalent to the Stanley Cup for music."

Recipients receive a 14-karat gold lapel pin that is a likeness of the violin.

"When Seymour contacted me to pitch the Golden Violin idea, I immediately thought, 'He's done it again,'" said Don McLean, dean of the Schulich school. "What a fantastic, creative way to enhance the profile of the school and to support young people of outstanding musical ability."

Schulich's $20-million gift was the largest individual donation to a university-based arts program in Canadian history.

It enabled the creation of 40 annual Schulich Scholarships and two endowed chairs, the second of which will be announced at a later date. The first is the Catherine Thornhill Steele Chair, named for a piano teacher and close friend of Schulich, to which violinist Andrew Dawes has been appointed.

As well, $8 million went toward the faculty's new building and its new recording, performing and music research facilities.

"Once again, Seymour Schulich has shown that he is the gold – or perhaps golden – standard for philanthropic innovation in Canada," said McGill principal Heather Munroe-Blum.

Schulich is co-founder of Franco-Nevada Mining Corporation and chairman of Newmont Capital Limited. A McGill graduate, he credits a $1,600 scholarship from U.S. brokerage firm Bache & Co. for helping him earn an MBA in 1965.

Transnistria: 65 years since the deportations

By BARUCH COHEN

Guest Voice

World War II encapsulated the most debased aspects of the human soul. As does every war, it carried the abominable germs of human savagery. The principle victim of its unspeakable cruelty was the Jewish population of Europe.

The history of the Holocaust of the Jews living in Romania, as that of Jews residing in other areas of Europe, encompasses both the perpetrators and the victims.

The Holocaust of Romanian Jews took place in the region of Transnistria. Prior to July 1941, the geographic entity called Transnistria did not exist. No region, province or country had ever carried this name, nor was it to be found on any map.

During World War II, the term Transnistria was coined to refer to a part of Ukraine, a strip of rich and fertile land stretching north from the Black Sea and bounded by the Dniester and Bug rivers. Jewish life had flourished here for several centuries. It was where the mystic Baal Shem Tov brought hope and joy as he wandered from one town to the next. It was from this area that Sholom Aleichem drew inspiration for his many literary heroes, including Fiddler on the Roof Tevye the Milkman. Odessa, Transnistria's largest city and one of Eastern Europe's richest Jewish cultural hubs, brought the world such famous Jewish personalities as Chaim Nachman Bialik, Achad Ha'am, Mendele Mocher Sfarim, S.M. Dubnov and Menachem Usishkin, as well as the group of thinkers and writers involved with the distinguished publications Ha'Shiloach and Ha'Olam.

The territory of Transnistria had been ceded to the Romanian government, led by the war criminal Gen. Ion Antonescu, to be exploited and administered. Beginning in August 1941, Antonescu ordered the deportation to Transnistria of close to 400,000 Romanian Jews from Bessarabia, Bukovina, Dorohoi and other areas. Until April 1944, Romanian Jews were under constant threat of deportation to Transnistria.

During those three years Transnistria would become known as the killing field for Romania's Jews. Although there were no gas chambers in Transnistria, and the killing there wasn't as organized as it was in the immense death factories of Maidanek, Treblinka, Sobibor and Auschwitz, two thirds of the Jews deported there were murdered.

Close to 350,000 Jews were murdered, and the killings were carried out by assassination, massacre, extermination, brutal persecution, torture, plunder, misery, disease and famine. The killing methods were extremely various and included almost everything an evil human mind could conceive.

But the suffering endured by the Romanian Jews was not due to German pressure. The massacres were carried out by soldiers and officers of the Romanian forces. The death marches throughout northern Bukovina and Bessarabia, the internment camps of Edinetti, Secureni, Vertujeni and Marculesti, as well as the deportations of the summer and autumn of 1941, were authorized by the Romanian army and approved by higher civil authorities.

In 1944, when Romania was liberated by the Soviet Union from Antonescu's fascist government, approximately 300,000 Jews living within Romania's borders, as well as roughly 68,000 Jews residing in nearby regions, had managed to survive. This was truly a Jewish miracle.

The survival of these populations was a result of various factors. The most significant, I believe, are the following:

- Romania was not under German military occupation.
- Romania's national economy could not function without the necessary services of Jewish merchants and businesses.
- Romanian leaders were of fickle temperament and character.

The Soviet army's swift attack on Romania in March 1944 eliminated the danger surrounding Transnistria and saved Jewish lives. The physically and emotionally weary survivors of the Transnistria killing field were finally free.

Zachor! Remember!

As writer Aharon Appelfeld, a survivor of Transnistria, has explained, "after the war, the first strategy for many survivors was oblivion, an attempt to escape the past, the camps, the ghettoes, the tortures, the humiliation – but I realized that without my past, what am I? Without the dimension of my past, life would be only on the surface."

We must resist letting our past be forgotten. The more we understand and remember our history, the better our future and the futures of our children and subsequent generations will be.

While the name Transnistria may only have been coined in the last century, its memory will now forever be remembered. Paying the price for endless and terrible suffering of hundreds of thousands of Jewish lives, the memory of Transnistria will remain as nothing but a horrible chapter in history.

Zachor! Remember!

Coast to Coast

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In "Western military might won't stop the jihadis" (Sept. 30, Globe and Mail) Jeffrey Simpson looks at the status of Al Qaeda on the fifth anniversary of 9/11. He refers to two recent reports: edited portions of a study by the National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) of the United States and a paper titled "Al Qaeda Five Years On: The Threat and the Challenges," by Maha Azzam. Simpson says Azzam is with Britain's Royal Institute of International Affairs, a body that changed its name to Chatham House more than two years ago – an oversight that speaks to Simpson's accuracy elsewhere in the column.

Simpson writes that both studies show that while Al Qaeda has been weakened, "its message remains alive and inspiring in copycat or smaller cells. Jihadists are marginal within the wider Muslim world, both assessments agree. The vast majority of Muslims disagree with the tactics of terror, even if objectives such as humbling the United States or asserting Muslim pride are welcome.

"More worrying is the spread of jihadist views in Western countries among small groups of alienated Muslims."

Simpson also notes: "Al Qaeda and the jihadists hurt themselves by attacking other Muslims, or by killing Muslims in attacks on Westerners."

Thus far, Simpson has accurately summarized both reports. He also rightly observes that, while "the reports don't state this conclusion, they imply support for the idea that the struggle against Islamic jihadism is mostly a debate within Islam itself about the tenets of the faith... It is at heart an intra-Islamic debate that produces a confrontation of Islam against itself and certain interpretations of Islam against other religious and secular faiths."

Accordingly, the best antidote to jihadism is not Western military power, except very occasionally, "but the influence... of more tolerant voices within Islam."

But Simpson's conclusion – which suddenly makes the Israeli-Palestinian dispute appear to be the central problem – is far off the mark.

Simpson cites Azzam as arguing that "the establishment of a Palestinian state with at least some parts of east Jerusalem represents the 'minimum required to win over the moderate faction within the Muslim world.'" However, Simpson deleted from Azzam's original report the following crucial parenthetical remark: "(although no one now asks for the implementation of UN resolution 242.)"

By omitting this reference, Simpson misses the implication of Azzam's point: that even "moderate" (versus "radical") Islamists cannot accept the right of Israel to exist in safe and secure borders – a key requirement of resolution 242.

Simpson also omits what Chatham House's own press release called a key message in Azzam's study: "One of Al Qaeda's most significant propaganda gains is its successful creation of a commonly held view that there is a link between terrorism and regional crises – e.g., Israel-Palestine and Iraq."

Islamists (whether "moderate" or "extremist") do not seek a secular Palestinian state, but rather an Islamic state in the entire region. As Azzam writes, at most, a Palestinian state would satisfy moderate Muslims only "symbolically." (A moderate Islamist, Azzam writes earlier in her report, may be just as "uncompromising" as an extremist; it's just that he eschews violence. Azzam appears to use "moderate Muslim" and "moderate Islamist" interchangeably.)

In "The real Mideast divide" (Globe and Mail, Oct. 4), Uri Dromi, director of international outreach at the Israel Democracy Institute in Jerusalem, writes about the real threats facing Israel – from Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas.

Dromi writes: "Yet, under the surface, Muslims in the Middle East still have serious troubles with each other, regardless of the existence of a Jewish state in their midst."

The intra-Muslim struggle, not Israel, is the central problem today in the Middle East.

Speaking of "moderates" vs. "extremists," while most Western journalists describe the secular Fatah as moderate, and Islamists such as Hamas as extremists, Danny Rubinstein, a longtime and sympathetic observer of the Arab world, warns (in "Unity as a Lifesaver," Ha'aretz, Oct. 3) that "[PA President Mahmoud Abbas] and Fatah are not much more moderate than Hamas, while [PA Prime Minister Ismail] Haniyeh and Hamas are not much more extreme than Fatah's supporters."

Montreal Hillel House gets facelift, new name

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jack Reitman was never able to finish university. He started at McGill in 1929. Then the stock market crashed, and that was the end of his formal education. The youngest of four sons of Romanian immigrants, he went to work in the family business, which, under his leadership, would become a national clothing store chain.

Reitman, who died 10 years ago, helped young people pursue their dreams throughout his life, said son Stephen Reitman. He also genuinely liked kids, and the family home always had young guests for Friday night dinners.

Stephen, his siblings Jeremy and Sarah Rubin, and their mother, Betty, knew that restoring the historic Hillel House on Stanley Street would be a meaningful way to memorialize the family patriarch.

The Jack Reitman Hillel House, as it has been renamed, was officially dedicated last month. The family was the lead donor for the $2.1-million renovation, which took six months to complete.

Built in the early 1900s, the stately building in the heart of the Golden Square Mile was the home of Montreal Gazette publisher Robert White. It was purchased by the Mount Royal Lodge of B'nai Brith, Hillel's original sponsor, in 1944, and has been Hillel House since 1952.

This is the first major upgrading and facelift to the three-storey building and, because it is designated as a heritage site, it had to be carried out within strict municipal and provincial guidelines. Including fundraising and planning, this was a four-year undertaking.

Other major donors are the family of Hillel president Allan Levitt, the Maurice Pollack Foundation and Leanor and Alvin Segal.

Decades of wear and grime have been erased, and the building has been brought up to modern standards. The original beauty is now shown off to advantage: the woodwork, plaster ceiling mouldings, big fireplaces, and stained-glass windows have been repaired or reinstalled. The linoleum in the dining room was removed to reveal the original hardwood floors, and decorative lighting has been added.

The renovations also include a makeover of the nine-bed dormitory on the top floor, an enlargement of the kitchen, and freshening up and refurnishing of lounges, student activity centres, a computer room, the chapel and staff offices. A library has been added with built-in bookcases, study cubicles and computer stations, as well as an outdoor patio.

The heavy front doors and stone steps have been refurbished; there's a new porch, and a third-floor balcony has been added. There is also a new security system, air-conditioning and plumbing.

Hillel student president Moishie Kahan said the reaction of other Hillel leaders in Canada to the renovated house is "wow" and envy that they don't have similar facilities. "Montreal Hillel is seen as a role model and inspiration across the country."

Hillel House provides religious, cultural and social programming to 8,000 Jewish students a year, not only from nearby McGill, but also from Concordia, the Université de Montréal, the Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM), and Dawson, John Abbott, Marianopolis and Vanier colleges.

Among those bringing greetings at the inauguration were McGill principal Heather Munroe-Blum and Concordia president Claude Lajeunesse, who thanked Concordia Hillel for its valuable contribution to campus life. The guest speaker was Harvard professor Ruth Wisse (McGill '57), a former McGill professor and a founder of its Jewish studies department.

Levitt said Hillel has had a busy season. Over 500 students attended a "back-to-school" Shabbat dinner, raising $7,000 for Combined Jewish Appeal. Hillel partnered with Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and the Egyptian and Lebanese students associations to hold a convivial Middle Eastern Day at Concordia during orientation week.

Hillel planned a joint Sukkot and end of Ramadan dinner with the Muslim Students Association. It is a sponsor of a lecture by Elie Wiesel at UQAM in November, and is planning a mission to northern Israel to help in the postwar reconstruction.

Wisse noted that in Jack Reitman's generation it was "unimaginable" for Jewish students to have a place near campus where they could observe Jewish customs, and the quota system severely restricted Jewish admissions to McGill.

By the time she was at McGill in the '50s those restrictions had eased but acknowledgement of the Jewish contribution to the world in the curriculum, let alone the study of it, was unheard of.

Young Jews got the message that being Jewish was something "homey but provincial, it was not in, it was not chic. Jews were expected to blend into gentile culture. I bought into that. I valued other cultures higher than our own."

But Jewish students today face a more serious challenge, she indicated. Arab and Muslim students are "fomenting hatred of Israel" on campus, she said. "Not all, but enough to change the atmosphere on North American campuses.

"Jewish students today bear the burden of confronting the representatives of thuggish regimes on campus. They must defend not only Israel, but the liberal, democratic, rational world view that Israel embodies."

Hillels, she urged, must have the staff and resources to meet this situation.

Darfur Fast raises awareness, money for victims

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For the second time in two years, STAND, a student-based not-for-profit Darfur advocacy group, asked students all over the world to give up a luxury item for one day last week and donate the money saved to help millions of Darfurian citizens.

Students Taking Action Now: Darfur, or STAND, organized the International Solidarity Fast for Darfur to raise awareness of the crisis in the war-torn region by asking students to abstain from a meal or their daily treat, such as a coffee, and donate the money they would have spent to the cause.

Jonathan Laski, a 22-year-old law student at the University of Ottawa and the media director for STAND Canada, said that this year, 50 American chapters and 12 Canadian chapters are involved in the effort, and campuses including University of Toronto, University of Western Ontario, Queens University and Concordia University are taking part.

Darfur Fast has an international presence as well, with the participation of schools in countries such as Ghana, Singapore and the United Kingdom.

"This is about students saying to other students that this is something you should know about, this is something you should care about and this is something that you should make part of your day," Laski said.

"It's an important event because it does two things. It allows us to be on campus with fellow students, expanding the awareness of what's going on," he added on the morning of the Oct. 5 event.

"We're going to be all dressed up in green, handing out literature on the subject, making a lot of noise and putting up tables around each campus. On top of that, money will be raised to go toward helping the relief effort."

Since 2003, the pro-government Arab militia, the Janjaweed, has attempted to exert control over the Sudanese region. A conflict between African farmers and Arabic nomads escalated into a war between guerrilla groups and the Janjaweed.

To date, hundreds of thousands of people have been murdered and raped, and about 2.5 million have been displaced into refugee camps where the threat of starvation and disease is constant.

Laski said he hopes this event will remind Canadian politicians that they are still not doing enough to protect a people who are unable to protect themselves.

He said that days before the Darfur fast, a dozen STAND members from the Ottawa area attended a parliamentary debate on the topic of the crisis.

"Obviously it was a slight success because we did have prominent parliament and cabinet members speak about Darfur for four hours. At the same time, we say that partisan politics is still playing way too large a role in this," Laski said, adding that the government is failing to comply with the Responsibility to Protect act, which was a Canadian-led initiative.

Part of the money raised in Canada will go directly toward the Darfur Fund, which aims to support humanitarian aid workers on the grounds in Darfur, and part will be used by STAND Canada to raise more awareness and create more programs.

Last year, the North American chapters of STAND raised more than $100,000 in one day, and Laski hopes to exceed that mark this year.

"This year, it's a slightly bigger operation because we have more campuses on board and high schools are participating; so I would say we should be able to exceed that $100,000 mark."

New Jewish course at U of T launches in January

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The University of Toronto's University College will offer a new Canadian Jewish studies course in January in honour of Joseph and Ethel Silver, and their son, Martin Silver.

Linda Silver Dranoff, along with her two living siblings and her brother's widow, decided that the best way to use funds raised in memory of her late parents and brother was to create a course called Canadian Jewish History, to contribute to the general understanding of Canadian Jewish life.

"We wanted to find a place where the funds could have a continuing benefit for people. To my family, the maintenance and appreciation and understanding of Jewish life was important, and we just felt that this was one way of doing it. The university had no course in Canadian Jewish history to our knowledge. It filled the gap," she said.

After speaking to the principal of University College, Sylvia Bashevkin – the first Jew and first woman in that role – about creating a pilot Jewish studies course for the university's Canadian studies program, the Silvers made a donation in April.

Although Silver Dranoff didn't want to disclose the size of the donation, she said it would be enough to hire a professor for the pilot course and to cover the cost of videotaping the lectures and distributing DVDs for continuing educational purposes.

"We hope that [the DVDs] will go to Jewish schools and libraries so that the information that is given in the course will be available in the Jewish community for other educational purposes," said Silver Dranoff, a Toronto family lawyer.

Professor, historian, and author of Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community, Franklin Bialystok, will teach the second-year undergraduate course.

Although he is not a full-time professor, Bialystok teaches another course at U of T called Holocaust and Memory, a fourth-year seminar at the Mississauga campus, and next semester, in addition to the new course, he'll teach a class on the Jews of Poland, which is also a fourth-year seminar course.

"What I'm going to look at is the course of the history of Jews in Canada right from the beginning until the current, from when there were no Jews in Canada – maybe secret Jews in the time of New France, before the British conquest of North America occurred – to the present," said Bialystok, who is also Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario chair of community relations.

Part of university's Canadian Studies Program

"I'm going to be doing it chronologically, but I'll also look at a number of different themes. One of the themes is the evolution of the community. A second theme is the contributions of Jews to Canadian society, and I'm also going to be exploring the diversity of the Jewish community, especially in the last 40 and 50 years, which I think is really important," he said of the half-year course.

Bialystok also hopes to explore the community's "collective memory of the Holocaust," anti-Semitism in Canada and its effect on Canadian Jews, as well as European Jews who were reluctant to immigrate to Canada because of anti-Semitism.

Bialystok will also try to bring the course up to date by talking about the role of Jewish organizations such as the CJC and B'nai Brith, and the impact of Zionism.

"I'm hoping students will gain an understanding and an appreciation of the variety of ethno-cultural communities in the country. They will also hopefully understand what adjustment and acculturation means in the Canadian context, and of course, the diversity part of it is especially important," he said.

Ken Aucoin, director of development and alumni affairs at University College, said that it will cost about $7,000 to run the pilot course, but the goal is to raise $1.1 million to "permanently endow curriculum content, student awards and guest speakers in Canadian Jewish studies within the Canadian studies program at University College.

"The idea is to promote tolerance and understanding among a broad range of students across U of T. Many students across U of T take Canadian studies courses as their electives and we expect many non-Jewish students will be interested in these courses," Aucoin said.

Silver Dranoff said she is sure that her late parents and brother would be thrilled that a course of this kind was created in their memory.

"My father was focused on the importance of education, and for many years, he was a member of the Bureau of Jewish Education in Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress. Education was always very important in our family."

Bialystok is hopeful that this course will contribute to the growth of the field of Canadian Jewish studies including Jewish literature, art and history.

"There is a tremendous opportunity for the exploration of scholarship in this field. This is just the start of what can grow into a wider exploration of Jewish life in Canada."

The ever-expanding fruits of the Land

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

What will most tempt you next time you're in the fruit and vegetable section of your local supermarket? An easy-to-peel, sweet and juicy seedless orange? A guava, free of its overpowering smell? A grapefruit-sized pumpkin that cooks in minutes in the microwave? Or exotic fruits known till now only to the bush-dwelling tribes of Africa and in the jungles of Latin America?

All of these and more are the hope of Israeli farmers and plant scientists who are developing dozens of new species.

"Each successful crop has an economic life cycle," says Yosef Mizrahi, professor of plant sciences at the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. "It begins with getting it into the export market. Once launched, it reaps profits until the competition catches up. At this point, the profits will go to those with access to cheap labour, cheap energy and cheap water. In Israel, none of these are cheap. That's why our original crop successes, Jaffa oranges and tomatoes, can no longer compete. To survive, Israeli agriculture must continually seek out new market niches."

Israel is on the cutting-edge of agricultural development, despite its limited natural resources. It has a fertile infrastructure of scientists, extension advisers, farmers and agriculture-related industries, and it is among global leaders in allocating funds to agricultural R&D, with $90 million (three per cent of the agricultural GNP) invested annually.

The raisin-tomato on the vine. This new product is being bottled with olive oil and spices and is beginning to appear in local supermarkets.

Some of that funding goes toward developing new and improved varieties of existing favourites. Israel's Jaffa orange has long since lost out to cheaper competition, but citrus fruit has not been abandoned.

"Citrus is a seasonal fruit and this is where we can find a market," says Yoram Eyal of the department of fruit tree breeding and molecular genetics at the Volcani Institute of Agricultural Research's Institute of Horticulture. "Most of our work is focused on easy peelers that ripen late in the season – which are also, of course, flavourful and low seed or seedless. Israel has developed some 20 to 30 new varieties of citrus, but very few have been commercialized. You can cross-breed for years to get the qualities you want, and then discover the fruit may have too short a shelf-life or some other characteristic that makes it unsuitable. The citrus for which we're best known today is the easy-peeling Orri mandarin, a clementine-like cultivar, marketed as Clemen'Or."

A team led by Eyal's colleague, Yoram Kapulnik, director of Volcani's Institute of Plant Sciences, works with other fruits. They have high hopes for three new varieties they are about to launch.

One is an aroma-free guava. "There are people who like the strong smell of the guava, but many, like myself, really hate it," says Kapulnik. "We've developed an odourless fruit, and have planted the first trees."

Another of his team's new products is the raisin-tomato. "These are cherry tomatoes, dried on the vine," he says. "Existing commercial sun-dried tomatoes are full-sized fruits which have either been sliced to dry in the sun or dried in the oven. The first is not a clean process, and the second dramatically reduces vitamin content. Our product is both clean and healthful. Our raisin-tomatoes are being bottled with olive oil and spices, and are beginning to appear in local supermarkets."

Israel has developed 20-30 varieties of citrus

Volcani's so-called personal pumpkin also has an improved hygiene. "Natural pumpkins are enormous and are sold in slices," says Kapulnik. "We've bred a pumpkin no bigger than a grapefruit and, at the same time, increased its sweetness. It can be left unrefrigerated for weeks. Sliced in half and popped in the microwave, it's a delicious snack."

Rather than claiming a market share by modifying and upgrading existing varieties, Mizrahi and his colleague Avinoam Nerd of the Institute of Agriculture and Applied Biology at Ben-Gurion University are trying to introduce new crops altogether.

"Improving existing crops is like adding light bulbs to a room already fully lit," Mizrahi says. He is working instead with wild plants from around the globe, which he believes can be the crops of the future.

Wild plants domesticated in Israel

"Since 1984, Avinoam Nerd and I have been exploring wild plants neglected by the scientific community," he says. "We've worked with some 45 different species from the African, American, Asian and Australasian continents that have been eaten by indigenous people for generations, testing them in five eco-zones around the Negev desert. Many were domesticated for the first time in Israel, and several, such as the Moroccan argania, for the first time anywhere."

Twenty-two years of investigation have shown that that at least 10 of these plants are potential cash crops of the future, according to the researchers.

"The first 'new' fruit we marketed, following 12 years of work, is the pitaya (sometimes called dragon fruit), a juicy cactus from Latin America with a subtle fruity flavour," Mizrahi says. "Working with dozens of plant technicians and PhDs, we crossbred a variety of pitayas – red, fuchsia, white-fleshed, green-scaled — and produced delicious, superb-quality hybrids. Now grown commercially by Israeli farmers, they are an economic success in Europe."

The pitaya came first because, being cacti, they use one-tenth of the water needed by other plants. Other species, however, are now almost ready for the market as well. The marula, a fruit that grows wild in the southern African bush, has been tamed in plantations on two Negev kibbutzim. Resembling a small, very juicy yellow mango, the sweet, tangy marula can be eaten as fruit, drunk for its juice, or made into ice cream, jello, jam and liqueur. The first commercial crop will ripen this year.

Another crop is the Latin American sapodilla, a small egg-shaped fruit whose rough brown skin encloses fragrant reddish-brown flesh with a taste between brown sugar and root beer. A plantation of four-year-old trees on Kibbutz Ma'agan Michael is about to bear its first commercial crop.

Waiting in the wings behind the marula and the sapodilla are six more species at an advanced stage of development, Mizrahi says.

The Ben-Gurion and Volcani teams use the traditional trial-and-error method of crossing and selecting.

"For the time being, we all use this classical approach," Eyal says. "That's how it's done today. But in my laboratory and in labs all over Israel, we're also studying the genes responsible for quality traits. The European market isn't yet ready for genetically modified products, but there's no doubt that transgenic produce lies in the future."

Brunch ideas for your leftover challah

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I don't know if you're like me, but I can't bear to throw away leftover bread, especially homemade challah. I put the leftovers in my freezer thinking that I'm going to use them, but somehow or other, it never happens.

But when Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are over, I start going through my freezer and find the little packages of leftover bread and challah – and out come all my bread pudding recipes.

I had never heard of bread pudding when I was growing up in Miami Beach. My grandmother made a "tzibbele kugel" (onion kugel) with her leftover challah, but that was kugel, not bread pudding. It wasn't until I moved to Atlanta as a teenager that I was introduced to the dessert called bread pudding, and I was hooked.

Aside from the varieties of wonderful desserts you can make with your leftover breads, there are also many savoury bread puddings just perfect for a brunch gathering. Try one of them for visitors during the upcoming Shmini Atzeret-Simchat Torah weekend.

A great plus to bread puddings is that recipes don't have to be exact and it's almost impossible to ruin them. If your recipe calls for one type of bread and you only have another type on hand, bread puddings are very forgiving. Don't be afraid to mix different breads together. You can even make a bread pudding in your crock pot!

FRENCH TOAST STRATA

1-lb. loaf french bread
1 package (8 oz.) cream cheese
8 large eggs
2½ cups whole milk or half and half
¼ cup maple syrup
1 recipe apple cider syrup (see below) or additional maple syrup

Spray a 9x13-in. baking dish with non-stick spray. Cut bread into 1-in. cubes. Place half the cubes in a prepared dish. Cut cream cheese into cubes and arrange over bread cubes. Add remaining bread cubes.

Combine eggs, milk and maple syrup. Beat well. Pour evenly over bread cubes. Cover and refrigerate for 2-24 hours. Bake at 350 for 40-50 minutes or until centre is set and top is lightly browned. Let stand 10 minutes, serve with Apple Cider Syrup or additional maple syrup. Serves 8-10.

Apple Cider Syrup:
½ cup sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch
½ tsp. cinnamon
dash nutmeg
dash salt
1 cup apple juice or cider
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. butter

In a small saucepan, stir together sugar, cornstarch, cinnamon, nutmeg and salt. Add apple and lemon juice. Bring to a boil over medium high heat, stirring. Reduce heat and continue to cook 1-2 minutes longer. Remove from heat and stir in butter. Serve warm over pancakes, waffles or French toast.

CHEESE STRATA

1½ lb. white bread, crust removed
2 lb. grated cheddar cheese
10 eggs, beaten
4 cups milk
1 tsp. dry mustard
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper, preferably white
2 tsp. Worcestershire sauce

Cut bread into cubes and mix with cheese. Set aside. Mix together eggs, milk and seasonings. Add bread and cheese mixture and mix well. Let stand for ½ hour.

Preheat oven to 350. Pour strata into 9x13-in. pan set in larger pan of hot water. Bake until brown and puffy, about 45-50 minutes. Serves 8-10.

VEGETABLE CHEESE STRATA WITH MUSHROOMS

2 stalks celery, chopped
1 cup cauliflower florets
1 cup broccoli florets
¼ cup chopped green pepper
3 eggs, beaten
1½ cups milk
1 tbsp. soy sauce
¼ tsp. dry mustard
¼ tsp. pepper
8 slices bread, cubed
1½ cups (6 oz.) shredded cheddar cheese

In a large saucepan, combine celery, cauliflower, broccoli and green pepper; steam until crisp-tender.

In a small bowl, mix eggs, milk, soy sauce, mustard and pepper. Oil a 1½-quart baking dish or souffle dish. In the baking dish, layer ½ the bread cubes, ½ the cheese, and the steamed vegetables. Top with remaining cheese, then remaining bread. Pour egg mixture over layers. Cover and refrigerate 6 hours or overnight. Preheat oven to 350. Bake, uncovered, 1 hour. Serves 6.

The chief of staff's warning

By URI DAN
Jerusalem Post

"In a state willing to release 400 prisoners in return for the bodies of three Israeli soldiers – the abduction of an Israeli soldier would be considered a strategic attack."

This was the very clear warning delivered by Chief of General Staff Dan Halutz to the top brass of the Israel Defence Forces Northern Command less than five months before two Israeli soldiers were abducted, and whose fate remains unknown to this day.

The chief of staff's warning in mid-February of this year was based on two facts: Hezbollah's success in contemptuously duping Israel up until the very last moment until the return of the bodies of the three soldiers it had murdered in Oct. 2000; and the warnings and evaluations made in his presence that Hezbollah was planning to once again abduct Israeli soldiers.

It was a special occasion: the first visit to the northern front made by Ehud Olmert after taking over as acting prime minister. Present in the division command post were Commander of the Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Udi Adam, Division Commander Brig.-Gen. Gal Hirsch, along with their assistants and other officers, and they described in minute detail the dangers posed by Hezbollah.

Adam, but not only he, underscored that the most dangerous period when Hezbollah was most likely to attack, including an attempt by them to abduct soldiers, would be in "April to July," because of reasons related to its patrons in Tehran and Damascus.

The chief of staff voiced his warning then. "A thousand Hezbollah militants do not represent a strategic threat to Israel," noted Halutz, but the abduction of a single soldier would represent a "strategic attack."

The acting prime minister was also accompanied by his military secretary Gadi Shamni, and then-defence minister Shaul Mofaz.

In the astounding debate that ensued, even the numbers of the rockets and missiles were reported with what would turn out to be stunning precision in light of what the entire nation later learned during the war – that Hezbollah had many thousands of short-range rockets and a small number of long-range missiles (200 to 250 kilometres) "capable of reaching Caesarea and Hadera."

In other words, more than a month before the elections, the commanding officers on the northern front spelled out detailed cautionary scenarios regarding Hezbollah, its intentions and preparations for war. Any commission that sets out to examine or investigate the minutes of that meeting in the division command post will have to deal with some very difficult questions.

How did it happen that despite the fact that Israel knew everything, it understood nothing?

Bearing in mind the difference in numbers and dimension, this is exactly what happened when Israel was taken by surprise in the Yom Kippur War in Oct. 1973, despite intelligence it possessed about the impending war. At least then, the IDF divisions moved forth in the direction of Damascus and Cairo. In Lebanon, IDF soldiers fought with almost suicidal devotion on the battlefield. As for their senior officers, however, such as division commanders Gal Hirsch and Brig.-Gen. Guy Zur, for example – serious question-marks remain regarding their performance in the war.

The intelligence community and the members of the air force were superbly prepared for the war. But when attempts are made to put spokes in the IDF wheels – as early as the second or third day of the war the Foreign Ministry comes along and proposes "an exit from the war" that has only just begun and is being fought with full force – there you have a recipe for failure.

It's already clear that bringing in the Lebanese army along with the UN to patrol forces along the border with Israel is preparing the ground for the development of the next round of hostilities to be launched by Hezbollah.

It must be remembered that at the time that the IDF, as noted, knew about Hezbollah's belligerent intentions in minute detail, it was already facing the incessant terror offensive of the Qassam rockets launched from the Gaza Strip toward Sderot and the other communities near Gaza.

How then did Ehud Olmert dare to appoint the inexperienced and unqualified Amir Peretz as defence minister during the very period when the IDF top brass and intelligence forces were warning against an additional front opening in the north, as they did during that meeting held in mid-February? The minimum would have been to retain Mofaz, who was more experienced in these subjects than anyone else in the Olmert government, in place as defence minister.

The appointment of Peretz proves that despite the warnings of the chief of staff, not only did those directly responsible in the northern command fall asleep on the job, but among the leaders of the new government, no one took the repeated warnings against Hezbollah with due seriousness. The dangerous hemorrhaging disease among Israel's political and security-military leadership is that everyone knows how to warn, and even to make very precise evaluations, but very few know how to handle the situation itself.

that Israel won from Syria in the 1967 Six-Day War and that Lebanon suddenly claimed after the Israeli withdrawal in 2000.

The UN checked the Lebanese claim and found it baseless, ruling that the status of the area should be decided between Israel and Syria.

Also last week, the United Nations said its peacekeepers in southern Lebanon are empowered to use force against Hezbollah.

The UNIFIL peacekeeper force, which was more than doubled in strength under the UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the war between Israel and the Lebanese militia, published its rules of engagement last week.

"Should the situation present any risk of resumption of hostile activities, UNIFIL rules of engagement allow UN forces to respond as required," the statement said. "UNIFIL commanders have sufficient authority to act forcefully when confronted with hostile activity of any kind."

The UN also said that the Lebanese army, which has deployed alongside UNIFIL in former Hezbollah strongholds, would set up checkpoints and inspect traffic for contraband – an apparent allusion to arms smuggling from nearby Syria.

As day broke Oct. 1 above the orchards and hills of the border, the Hezbollah flags and armed patrols that had been a menacing presence for the past six years were gone. Instead, a Lebanese army helicopter buzzed overhead, and blue-helmeted UN peacekeepers could be seen taking up positions.

"Finally, I can go out with my children without feeling we are being tracked by Hezbollah gunmen," said Eitan Davidi, chair of the Fence Communities Forum. "We won the war."

But there was little Israeli jubilation at the pullout, which coincided with the sombre run-up to Yom Kippur. Israel went to war after Hezbollah killed eight of its soldiers and abducted two in a July 12 raid. The fact that Hezbollah was pushed back from the border fell short of early Israeli promises to crush the militia and retrieve the two hostages.

The loss of 157 Israelis, some of them to thousands of Hezbollah rockets fired across the border, undermined Israel's sense of national security. In a round of media interviews, military chief Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz described Israel's performance during the Lebanon offensive as "mediocre."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has been at pains to highlight the strategic gains of the war, noting the UN intervention in southern Lebanon and arguing that Israel has boosted its deterrence in the face of Iran and Syria, another Hezbollah patron.

But dissent has reached as deep as Olmert's own cabinet. According to a Ha'aretz expose, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, campaigned for an "exit strategy" early in the war. Another cabinet member, Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, predicted that the calm on the Israel-Lebanon border would not last.

"Whoever is banking on us gaining security from the Lebanese army's presence in the south is delusional," Ben-Eliezer, a former defence minister, told Army Radio. "I believe we'll be seeing all the usual sights of a Hezbollah presence very soon."

Kidnapped soldiers healthy, Russian minister says

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Russian intelligence indicates that kidnapped IDF reservists Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser are in good physical condition, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Oct. 4.

The foreign minister made his comments during a visit by an Israeli delegation, led by MKs Ya'acov Margi (of the Shas party) and Yisrael Hasson (of Israel Beiteinu), to Strasbourg. Goldwasser's wife, Karnit, was also part of the delegation.

The group was joined by Aryeh Ayidor, Israel's ambassador to the European Council, and Boaz Rodkin, the Ministry of Foreign Affair's European section deputy.

According to Lavrov, Russia was making great efforts to gather intelligence on Goldwasser and Regev from Syria and Iran and would pass any information it obtained on to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

The delegation met with the president of the European Council, several parliamentarians, faction heads and other council officials.

During their meeting with the Russian foreign minister, Karnit Goldwasser asked Lavrov to take action to secure the release of the two soldiers.

He reiterated that Russia was involved in UN efforts to bring about the release of Regev and Goldwasser, as well as kidnapped Israeli soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit. He could not, however, elaborate on specific contacts Russia was making.

Karnit Goldwasser mentioned rumours that she had heard the soldiers had been wounded and asked Lavrov to promise he would verify that they had received proper medical care.

Lavrov promised to continue to help, and said he would brief Olmert on the topic during his upcoming visit to Moscow.

Canadians and Cubans meet on birthright trip

BY JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — When the 11 Cuban members of birthright israel's Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) trip last summer got to their feet to ring in Shabbat with song and dance, the group's 40 Canadian members looked on in awe.

"I think Canadians are a lot more reserved," says Jason Ansel, 23, a participant from Montreal. "It's not that we didn't want to sing and dance – it's just that's not normally how we bring in Shabbat."

This was the first of many cultural encounters group members had on CIE's third annual Canada-Cuba Israel Experience program, which took place this summer, before the start of the school year. For 10 days, young Cubans from Jewish communities around the island toured Israel with young Canadians from Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and Calgary, along with 10 Spanish/English/Hebrew-speaking Israel Defence Forces soldiers, who comprised the third component of the special Israel experience program.

"At CIE we want to bring as diverse an experience to birthright israel as possible," says Lorne Klemensberg, director of Israel programs for CIE. "The Cubans add an element to the trip that makes it very dynamic. Cuba is a very unique place with very unique people. It is enlightening for young Canadians and young Israelis to gain an understanding of how Cuban Jews live. At the same time, the Cuban participants gain an understanding that they are part of a much bigger Jewish community. It is a very exciting three-way 'mifgash' experience."

The idea for the program was born in 2002, when William Miller, a 30-year-old Jewish community leader from Havana, first heard about birthright israel. "We wanted to participate very badly, but because of the economic situation in Cuba we weren't able to pay for our share of the costs," he says.

Each country that participates in birthright israel pays one-third of the cost, with the other two-thirds covered by philanthropic dollars and the government of Israel. That's where Canada stepped in.

The Cuban Jewish community already had a long-standing relationship with the Canadian Jewish community, ever since the United States imposed an embargo against Cuba in 1962. "It is much more difficult for the American Jewish community to help the Cuban Jewish community," says Klemensberg. "That's how it came to be that the Canadian Jewish community ended up 'adopting' the Cuban one."

What started as a Canadian Jewish campaign to send kosher food containers for the High Holy Days to Cuba has blossomed into Canada becoming the Cuban community's primary Jewish lifeline. "Our relationship with Canada is very important to us," says Miller. "Nowhere is this more true than with the funding assistance the Canadian community gives us so that we are able to participate in birthright israel.

Since the first Canada-Cuba Israel Experience program in 2003, a total of 40 Jewish youths from Cuba have had the opportunity to visit Israel.

A group of birthright israel alumni from Cuba came to Canada last September for a leadership course, and last year, a group of 13 birthright israel alumni from Canada visited Cuba. "It was the single most dynamic followup program we have ever had," says Klemensberg.

"It was a really amazing opportunity for both of us," adds Miller. "It is very important for us to show the Canadians the Jewish life that we have in Cuba, and for us to learn about Jewish life in Canada. It's great to learn and share experiences together."

Birthright israel participant Vivian Salomon, 20, from Vancouver, couldn't agree more. For Salomon, the meeting with the Cubans has been the highlight of her Israel experience. "Meeting the Cubans has been really fascinating. They are truly amazing people," says Salomon, a fourth-year psychology major at the University of British Columbia. "I have learned so much from them."

Indeed, there is a lot to be learned about Cuban Jewry, which celebrates its centennial this year. The first official Jewish congregation was founded in 1906. Since then, Jewish life in Cuba has been marked by upheaval after upheaval.

The Jewish population reached its peak of 15,000 just before the revolution in 1959, when Fidel Castro became the country's prime minister. When Castro came into power, approximately 94 per cent of Cuba's Jews fled.

> 'The Jewish community in Cuba is very special'

Some were able to move to Israel, thanks to diplomatic efforts of the Canadian government. Then, in the early 1990s, Operation Cigar was launched and within a five-year period, more than 400 Cuban Jews secretly immigrated to Israel, as well.

Around the same time, Jewish life – which like all religious life in Cuba, had been largely restricted for three decades – was jump-started by the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which since 1992 has sent rabbis and community organizers to help re-educate the existing Jewish population, perform ceremonies and otherwise play an instrumental role in rebuilding Cuba's Jewish life.

Cuba's current Jewish population numbers around 1,500, with the vast majority of Jews – at least 90 per cent – living in Havana. Small Jewish communities also exist in Caibarien, Camaguey, Guantanamo, Santa Clara and Sancti Spiritus.

"The Jewish community in Cuba is very special," says Miller. "Rebuilding it has not been easy, but the work we are doing is very important because we are trying to keep Jewish life alive."

"We work very hard to keep our Jewish traditions in Cuba," adds 21-year-old trip 'madrich' Amed Ragas, originally from Camaguey. "We lost it for so many years, so we are working hard not to lose it again."

According to Ragas, Jewish observance is still difficult in Cuba. For starters, it is nearly impossible to be kosher, due to the lack of availability of kosher food. "While it's true that we cannot be Orthodox, it's also true that we are a great community. Everybody knows each other and takes care of each other," he says.

He added that the country's youth movement and women's organization, as well as each district's organization, works together in a tightknit network for the betterment of all Cuban Jewry. "I belong to a great people, with our own unique traditions and customs. I am very proud to be a Cuban Jew."

For Ragas, meeting the Canadians has highlighted the importance of his community's efforts. "I think a lot of Canadians take Jewish observance for granted," he says. "Many of them choose an unobservant lifestyle, and this is not a choice for us in Cuba, where we really cherish every possible element of observance.

"On the other hand," he says, "Canadians are very Zionistic. Their connection to Israel is very strong, and this is something that we, being more isolated, lack.

"Where one of our communities is stronger, the other is weaker, and vice-versa. This is how we learn from each other."

This is not to say that Zionism is not a part of Cuban Jewry. "Israel is a great, great country," says Ragas. "I feel like I have a place in this country and this country has a place in me. Being here – especially with the Canadians – makes me realize that I am part of something bigger."

Maria Tavoado-Dila, 22, from Guantanamo, says "it has been very nice to meet the Canadians. We have shared a lot with them. They are very curious about our history and our Jewish experience in Cuba, and they are very open about their lives and their communities in Canada.

"It is amazing being in Israel with them, and to meet Israelis, too. Being with Jews from all over the world somehow makes me feel more Jewish."

Maurice Fernandez, 18, from Havana, who is clad in a red and white "Canada" T-shirt and baseball cap, says: "We are really sharing this experience of Israel together. Now the Canadians say they want to come to Cuba to visit us, and we want to come to Canada to visit them!"

The feelings are mutual. "Meeting the Cubans has been this great mix of culture," says Jesse Otto, 24, from Toronto. "We are seeing Israel not just through our own eyes, but from Cuban Jewish eyes, as well."

Ansel says: "We don't speak Spanish and they barely speak English. But the first time we sang in Hebrew, we sang together. It was the first time that we looked at each other and truly understood each other without that translator in the middle.

"I am amazed that such different people from such different places with such different backgrounds can come together with one thing in common: being Jewish," says Salomon. "We are so different in so many ways, but we all agree on one thing: our love for Israel.

Elie Wiesel granted honorary knighthood by British gov't

By JONNY PAUL
The Jerusalem Post

LONDON — Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, the author, academic and human rights campaigner, is to be presented with an honorary knighthood by the British government next month for his services to Holocaust education in the United Kingdom.

Wiesel will be presented with the award by Foreign Secretary Margaret Becket at a special ceremony on Nov. 30, at the Foreign Office in London.

Following the award, Wiesel, who is the vice chair of the Yad Vashem Council, as well as chair of the United States Holocaust Memorial Council, will be guest of honour at a special dinner hosted by Yad Vashem UK.

On learning of the award, Wiesel said: "I am grateful for the honour and hope it will help us serve the noble and urgent cause of remembrance."

After surviving Auschwitz and Buchenwald concentration camps, Wiesel has dedicated his life to ensuring that the memory of the Holocaust is never forgotten. He is the author of 36 educational works dealing with Judaism, the Holocaust and the fight against racism.

In 1986 he received the Nobel Peace Prize. He was also awarded the Congressional Medal of Honour in 1985 and established the Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity in 1987.

Its mission is to advance the cause of human rights and peace throughout the world by creating a new forum for the discussion of urgent ethical issues confronting humankind.

Possibly one of the greatest post-Holocaust writers, Wiesel has given the world an insight into the horrors of the Nazi regime. His more than 45 books have won numerous awards. His first book, written in 1958, the internationally acclaimed La Nuit (Night), details his own experience in the death camps and has become arguably the most powerful piece of Holocaust literature ever published and is used as an educational tool in schools across the United Kingdom.

After the war, he settled in France and studied at the Sorbonne. He wrote for French and Israeli newspapers and began his work as a writer. In 1956 he moved to the United States and was naturalized in 1963. He taught at City College, New York and later became a professor of humanities at Boston University.

Jeffrey Pinnick, chair of Yad Vashem UK, said: "Elie Wiesel's life has been dedicated to keeping the memory of the Holocaust alive and we are thrilled that the British government has recognized his unique and far reaching contribution in the UK.

"No other individual has played such an influential role in ensuring that the next generation can learn from the lessons of the Holocaust. Yad Vashem UK feels privileged to work alongside such an inspirational and exceptional individual," he added.

The Yad Vashem UK Foundation's mission is to ensure that the tragedy of the Holocaust is never forgotten, honour the memory of those who perished and to impart the legacy of the Holocaust to shape a more humane future.

The foundation is involved in remembrance and in the field of informal education. It organizes day visits to Auschwitz and works closely with educators at Jewish schools and youth movements across the United Kingdom.

It has just launched its Guardian of the Memory campaign, which seeks to enlist the support of every Jewish person in the United Kingdom, as well as other faiths, to become a guardian of a victim of the Holocaust to ensure that each victim will never be forgotten.

Cop refuses to guard Israeli embassy

By GEORGE CONGER
Jerusalem Post

LONDON — London's top cop has launched an investigation into last week's press reports of a Muslim policeman being excused duty from guarding the Israeli embassy on moral grounds.

Police constable Alexander Omar Basha, a member of the Metropolitan Police's Diplomatic Protection Group, was reassigned after he refused to guard Israel's embassy in Kensington, West London.

Basha told his superiors he objected to the Israeli bombing campaign against Hezbollah in south Lebanon that caused the deaths of over a 1,000 Muslims, and had participated in anti-war protests, the Sun reported.

Metropolitan Police Commissioner Ian Blair promised an "urgent review" of the incident after the Sun, broke the story.

In a statement to the BBC, however, the Association of Muslim Police stated Basha had requested reassignment because he had concerns over Lebanese family members and was perturbed guarding the embassy during this summer's 34-day war in south Lebanon.

"This is an issue around the welfare of a particular officer," AMP spokesperson Superintendent Dal Babu said on behalf of the constable, and was not religiously motivated.

"The Metropolitan Police are setting a precedent they will come to bitterly regret. Top brass granted his wish, as they were probably frightened of being accused of racism. But what they've done is an insult to the Jewish community," he told the Sun.

Dubbed the "PC PC" (politically correct police commissioner) by his critics, Blair last week backed a proposal calling for consultation with a panel of Muslim leaders before mounting counter-terrorist operations. The Muslim leaders, who must undergo security checks, will advise the police on the potential political consequences of terrorist interdiction raids upon London's Muslim immigrant communities.

The opening of police intelligence briefings to members of the Muslim community comes at the same time as the first reorganization of the security services since the start of the war on terror five years ago. On Oct. 2, the Metropolitan Police announced the merger of the Special Branch and Anti-Terrorism Branch to form a 1,500-man Counter Terrorism Command.

The head of the new force, Deputy Assistant Commissioner Peter Clarke stated the CT Command would "do everything in our power to ensure that the capital becomes an even more hostile environment for terrorists."

"Everyone who has worked in the Met's Special Branch and Anti-Terrorist Branch can justly be proud of their achievements in tackling the terrorist threat over many decades. Whether that threat has come from the United Kingdom or elsewhere, the response has always been robust, and with total respect for the rule of law; this will continue," he said.

Correction

The headline of the column "CHAT participating in archeology dig" (CJN, Oct. 5) was incorrect. The possibility of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto participating in an archeological dig in Tel Dor, Israel, was discussed in the column; however, CHAT has decided not go ahead with the project. The CJN regrets the error.

Israel Briefs

Group helps survivors

The Claims Conference is making some 12,000 payments of about $250 (US) each to Holocaust survivors affected by Hezbollah attacks in northern Israel over the summer. Details are available at www.claimscon.org.

Meridor next envoy to U.S.

Israel named the former chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Sallai Meridor, as its next ambassador to the United States. Meridor will succeed Daniel Ayalon when Ayalon ends his four-year tenure in Washington, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office said. The handover is expected to take place in January.

Nobel winner at Hebrew U

The winner of this year's Nobel Prize in chemistry is a visiting professor at Hebrew University of Jerusalem. The university congratulated Roger Kornberg for his win in recognition of his research into how genes are copied. Kornberg, a professor of structural biology at Stanford University, is also a fellow at Hebrew U's department of biological chemistry.

Outpost expansions alleged

An Israeli watchdog group accused Israelis in the West Bank of expanding outposts "under cover" of the Lebanon war. Peace Now said 31 outposts, built without government authorization, were expanded this summer while Israeli authorities were focused on war with Hezbollah. The Yesha council denied the charge, and accused Peace Now of disgracing the memory of 11 soldiers from the West Bank killed fighting in Lebanon. Cabinet members such as Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Defence Minister Amir Peretz have recently called for a crackdown against building outposts so as to maintain Israel's diplomatic credibility.

Ukrainian leader to visit

Ukrainian President Viktor Yuschenko will visit Israel in early November. Yuschenko, who is expected to arrive Nov. 7, said his country is ready to assist Israel in developing satellites and missiles. "We were among the developers of the Sputnik in the days of the former Soviet Union, and we have a long-range missile industry and much knowledge that we can share with Israel. I am a great believer in relations with Israel," Yuschenko said.

Oil found near Dead Sea

Prospectors have found a small amount of oil near the Dead Sea. Ginko, an Israeli oil exploration company, said the site discovered last week could yield 100 to 150 barrels a day, a small amount, but there were signs of other untapped oil traps nearby.

Minister sees more war

An Israeli cabinet minister said another war with Hezbollah could be imminent. Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, Israel's national infrastructure minister and a former defence minister, said the deployment of UN peacekeepers and the Lebanese army in former Hezbollah strongholds was no guarantee the current quiet would hold. "I predict another war with Hezbollah within months," he told Israel Radio. "We must not take lightly Hezbollah's rhetoric about the Lebanese army's presence in southern Lebanon being no guarantee of security for Israel. We should rehabilitate the Israel Defense Forces and the home front as fast as possible."

New operating orders

Israeli soldiers who feel threatened by Lebanese demonstrators along the northern border will be allowed to open fire in self-defence, a high-ranking officer said. According to the officer, the IDF Operations Directorate formulated new orders for forces stationed along the border. "There are new procedures for opening fire, and if there are demonstrations that endanger soldiers, they can shoot at the feet of the main inciter," the officer said. "If there are circumstances that endanger soldiers, then they can open fire to remove the risk."

Olmert, Bush to meet

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert will meet U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington in November. Olmert, who met in Jerusalem last Wednesday with Condoleezza Rice, the U.S. secretary of state, told a Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations' conference call that he would meet Bush on his way to Los Angeles for the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities, which slated for Nov. 12 to15.

Anti-Semitism pervaded Polish society after WWII

Fear: Anti-Semitism in Poland After Auschwitz by Jan Gross, Random House.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Jewish survivors returned to their home towns in Poland after World War II, they were often greeted with undisguised hostility.

"So, you are still alive," their Catholic neighbours would say acidly, dropping unambiguous hints that they should leave immediately, or else.

Jan Gross

Jews at the receiving end of this verbal abuse must have been shocked, the prevalence of anti-Semitism in Poland notwithstanding. Given the fact that 90 per cent of Polish Jewry had been annihilated during the Holocaust, Jews may have expected a kinder, gentler reception.

But this was not to be. A pogrom broke out in Krakow on Aug. 11, 1945, barely three months after the war, and less than a year later, the bloodiest pogrom in 20th-century peacetime Europe erupted in the city of Kielce.

Why did Poles exhibit such murderous animosity toward a people who had suffered so terribly at the hands of their common Nazi enemy?

Jan Gross, a Princeton University historian originally from Poland, grapples with this important question in Fear: Anti-Semitism in Poland After Auschwitz. It is a book that is bound to reignite an old debate about the contentious relationship between Jews and Poles.

But Gross is well placed to examine this controversial and still relevant issue. His previous work, Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland, published in 2001, touched a raw nerve in his native land.

Fear, a polemic of fierce, no-holds-barred honesty backed by rigorous research, will doubtless stir debate as well.

He argues that traditional anti-Semitism aside, the upsurge of anti-Jewish animus in Poland after 1945 was essentially caused by two factors. The first turned on the ownership of Jewish property, and the second on Jewish responsibility for the Communist takeover.

During the German occupation, he writes, Poles "grabbed" as much as they could of material goods left behind by Jews who had either left voluntarily or been deported by the Nazis.

"Jews were also directly murdered by Poles who wanted to acquire their property," he adds. "Mass killings, of which the murder in Jedwabne was but one episode, were accompanied by widespread and thorough plunder of Jewish property."

Occasionally, Jews entrusted their property to what they believed were trustworthy neighbours, only to discover that they could not reclaim it after the war. Poles who had profited from these arrangements were none too pleased when Jews returned to claim their properties, Gross suggests.

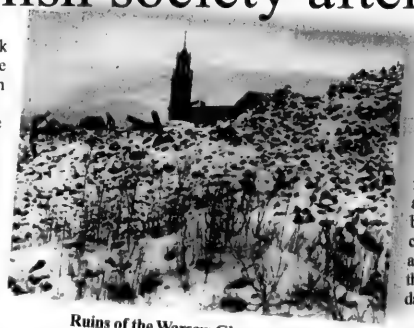
Decrees and regulations issued in 1945 temporarily transferred "abandoned" Jewish – and ethnic German – property to state ownership. Much of this property has yet to be given back to its rightful owners.



Ruins of the Warsaw Ghetto in 1946

The sovietization of Poland, which brought Communist rule to a deeply Catholic nation, was another pivotal factor in fanning the flames of anti-Semitism. Poles who blamed Poland's descent into communism on Jews customarily talked about zydokomuna, the supposed link between Judaism and communism.

This accusation was grounded in unadulterated ignorance, Gross says. The estimated proportion of Jews in the Polish Communist Party throughout the 1930s was about 25 per cent. "This would mean that at the moment of [its] greatest popularity, some 7,000 to 7,500 Jews – one-fifth of one per cent of the total Jewish population at the time – were involved," he observes.

Most Jews, however, supported mainstream political parties. "The evidence shows that not only were the overwhelming number of Jews not Communist supporters but the vast majority of Communist voters were not Jews."

During the postwar era, when Poland was under the sway of communism, Jewish Communists held important governmental positions. Yet these deracinated individuals, who had severed their connections with the Jewish community, were gradually removed in a series of purges to improve the party's image in the eyes of ordinary Poles.

The future of these Communists of Jewish origin was perennially uncertain. As Gross puts it, "No matter how far they ascended, they could always be reminded, by friend and foe alike, that they were Jewish."

Anti-Semitism, of course, was not officially part of communist ideology. But in the ideal world envisaged by communism, ethnic identification would be superfluous and Jews would cease to exist as a separate entity.

As Gross points out, Polish Communists failed miserably to eradicate ethnic nationalism. But they fulfilled the dream of Polish racists by creating an ethnically pure state, all but bereft of minorities such as Jews, Germans and Ukrainians.

The Communist party, which expediently recruited prewar fascists to its ranks, achieved this objective by encouraging non-Poles to emigrate and by downplaying anti-Jewish violence in the immediate aftermath of the war.

By the end of 1945, the Jewish population of Poland peaked at 200,000, compared to 3.3 million in 1939. During this unstable period, when Poland was convulsed by a civil war, Jews were regularly attacked. Gross estimates that perhaps as many as 1,500 Jews were killed in such random incidents. Only truly assimilated Jews were shielded from this wave of violence.

The first postwar pogrom, in Rzeszow, took place on June 12, 1945, but it was eclipsed by a pogrom in Kielce on July 4, 1946. Claiming the lives of more than 40 Jews, it was the high-water mark in anti-Semitic violence in Poland. Some 60 Poles were tried for their complicity in the affair, but the Polish government otherwise downplayed it.

Prior to the Kielce pogrom, the primate of Poland, Cardinal August Hlond, was approached at least twice by Jews to issue a pastoral letter or statement condemning anti-Semitism. But he refused. Only the bishop of Czestochowa, Teodor Kubina, spoke up forcefully against anti-Semitism.

Cardinal Hlond's attitude should not have been too surprising. Jan Karski, a sympathetic Polish official who secretly visited the wartime Warsaw Ghetto, wrote in a report submitted to the Polish government-in-exile in London that Nazi policies toward Jews found support in "a broad segment of Polish society."

No wonder anti-Semitism was such a potent factor in Poland after the Nazis had been defeated.

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin Librach

What do the happiest people have in common? Well, they stay positive, no matter what. They have a joyful attitude. They stay in the present moment and stop worrying about what has happened in the past and what is going to happen in the future. They smile a lot and laugh even more. They are in tune with their values. They help others and are kind.

Happiness and kindness often go hand in hand. When you are kind, compassionate and loving to others, you feel good.

As M. J. Ryan states in her book The Happiness Makeover, "Wanting to bring happiness or pleasure to someone else rather than from a sense of obligation – feels so good. We experience in ourselves the good feelings of the other person."

So why does happiness elude so many people? What I notice as a life coach is that people become stuck in their thinking. As author James Mann says, "All that you achieve and all that you fail to achieve is a direct result of your own thoughts." Or, as psychologist Sheila Krystal puts it: "You are one thought away from a good feeling."

So how do we change negative, self-defeating thoughts into positive, optimistic and joyful ones?

We can choose to see things in a more positive light. We really do direct our own thoughts, and we can choose the happier feeling by changing the words we say to ourselves.

Joyful people are kind to themselves. They like themselves and are full of hope and optimism. Studies show that optimists live longer. Indeed the Mayo Clinic proved that a rosy outlook can extend your life for up to 10 years.

Also happy people live in the present and enjoy every moment to the full. Haven't you noticed that when you are engaged in something you love, with people you love, and you are just experiencing life simply, like a child at play, you immediately return to that natural state of happiness?

In You Can Be Happy, No Matter What, Richard Carlson says, "Perhaps it happened while you were sitting in front of a fireplace, taking a walk or looking at a beautiful sunset – healthy functioning is present whenever you feel wonderful for no particular reason. The important point is that the fireplace or the activity didn't cause your good feeling. What happened was you temporarily relaxed, cleared your mind of concerns and simply took a few moments to enjoy your life."

To create more happiness in our lives, here are some joy boosters that never fail.

- Celebrate your unique gifts and talents. Where do you shine? How can you make the world a better place every day by utilizing those gifts and serving others?
- Always look for the good. It may take some practice at first, but you will will feel happier when you try to look for the good in every situation.
- Make sure you are living your values.
- Surround yourself with positive, optimistic people.
- Don't be attached to the outcome. Stay open to new ways of looking at things.
- Celebrate your family and friends and the people who bring joy to your life.
- Think of things that make you happy and recreate the memory – like laughing with a friend or seeing a gorgeous sunset. The brain can't differentiate between remembering the moment and the moment itself, so you will still experience that rush of good feeling as if it were happening again.
- Appreciate what you have, and don't say, "I'll be happy when I have this or that." Happiness comes from within, from right now. And you can learn with practice to tap into the happiness gene whenever you wish.
- Put love in your heart and be kind to others.
- Laugh and use humour whenever possible.

And finally remember, "Joy is what happens to us when we recognize how great things really are!"

Illusionist's childhood dreams do come true

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Illusionist Brad Ross has been intrigued by magic since he took a class as a preschooler in New Jersey.

Now 25, Ross said that by age 12 he had dubbed himself Mr. Magic, and placed an ad in a Scotch Plains, N.J. newspaper.

"This led to performances at children's birthday parties, local town events and charity shows," said Ross, who is appearing in the Canadian debut of Disney Live's Mickey's Magic Show, at the Hummingbird Centre, Oct. 19 to 22.

"From the beginning my goal was to take the audience on a journey of wonder and curiosity," Ross said in a phone interview while on tour in Las Vegas. Ross is a member of the International Brotherhood of Magicians, the Society of American Magicians and the International Magicians Society.

He first visited Las Vegas at age 13 and saw a Siegfried and Roy show. "They amazed me. I had always dreamed of becoming an illusionist, but I never imagined I could be in a show as grand as that."

The attraction of magic, Ross said, was that it was "something I could do that gave me a spot. I am the youngest of three brothers and I felt the need to shine."

Lucky for him, he said, his father, an orthodontist, always encouraged him to do what he enjoys doing. "He wanted me to choose a job that I loved, and believe me, there is nothing greater than waking up and going to the theatre.

"I always remind him that I'm following in the footsteps of Houdini and David Copperfield, two famous Jewish magicians. Like them, I always want to perform magic on a large scale."

Illusion and magic are one and the same, he said, "but just like a cardiologist is a doctor who specializes in the heart, I am a magician who specializes in illusion. I combine music, choreography and lighting to make my show a theatrical production.

"I interact directly with the audience and bring them on stage. When you can invite moms, dads and kids to come on stage and assist, it engages them in the show and gives them an unforgettable experience in magic."

In order to bring magic to as many kids as possible, Ross founded New Jersey's local chapter of Project Magic, a charity program started by David Copperfield, that brings magic to hospitals.

He also headlines at a number of fundraisers for such organizations as the AIDS Foundation, American Cancer Society, Juvenile Diabetes and Make-A-Wish-Foundation.

"I have been given the gift to make people smile and laugh. I want to show people that no matter how hard things get, no matter how scary or dangerous our world becomes, if we take a moment to use our imagination and believe in magic, we can escape to a world where anything can happen."

Film documents international diplomatic incident caused by artwork

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On Jan. 16, 2004, Israel's ambassador to Sweden, Zvi Mazel, created an international diplomatic flap when he physically attacked an unusual art exhibit at the Museum of National Antiquities in Stockholm.

The work, Snow White and the Madness of Truth, was by Israeli artist Dror Feiler and his Swedish wife, Gunilla Skold Feiler.

The unconventional installation showed a boat in a rectangular basin, filled with red fluid, carrying a glamorous photograph of Hanadi Jaradat, a Palestinian suicide bomber and mother of two who killed 22 Jews and Arabs in a Haifa restaurant in October 2003.

The exhibit was linked to a forthcoming conference on genocide sponsored by Sweden and slated to be attended by Israel.

When Mazel saw it, he went ballistic. He ripped out electrical wires attached to the exhibit and tossed a spotlight into the basin. Mazel was summoned to the Swedish foreign ministry to be reprimanded, but Israel's prime minister at the time, Ariel Sharon, went out of his way to thank Mazel for having stood up to what he called the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Europe.

Two Swedish filmmakers, Erik Pauser and Thomas Nordenstad, have made a documentary about that event. Snow White and the Ambassador will be screened on Oct. 21 at the Goethe Institut as part of the sixth annual Toronto Diaspora Accented Cinema Film Festival.

The nearly one-hour film contains footage of that actual incident, interviews with Mazel and Feiler and news clips of comments, pro and con, from ordinary Swedes.

Mazel accuses the Feilers of glorifying Jaradat, trying to wash away her sin, encouraging mass murder and insulting the memory of Holocaust victims. He adds that the installation is in poor taste, primitive and politically provocative.

In a painfully embarrassing scene, the director of the museum pleads with Mazel to leave the premises. As he departs in a huff, Mazel claims that the installation will touch off "a second Holocaust."

Feiler, a resident of Stockholm who opposes Israel's occupation of the West Bank and considers Israel an "apartheid state," protests that Mazel does not understand the exhibit and crossed a line in attacking his right to express himself.

In further comments, Feiler insists that the fluid in the basin represents the blood of Jaradat's victims and says that, while he understands what motivated her, he does not "accept" what she did.

To round out the film, Pauser and Nordenstad insert snippets of interviews with Swedes who either liked or disliked the exhibit. A Holocaust survivor voices indignation, while another person pronounces it "very moving and thoughtful."

Given the wide range of views, Snow White and the Ambassador seems balanced. But on closer examination, it is sympathetic to the Feilers and hostile to Israel.

Without a shred of evidence, the filmmakers glibly suggest that Mazel's attack was "pre-planned" rather than simply impulsive. Mazel, rightly, urges the interviewer not to be misled by conspiracy theories.

Pauser and Nordenstad also claim that Mazel "destroyed" the installation. He did nothing of the kind.

As well, they sneak in extraneous footage from a pro-Palestinian film, Route 181, and give the Israeli co-director, Eyal Silvan, free rein to say that Israel is a "criminal state."

By injecting this jarring, off-topic partisan political note into the movie, they reveal their real agenda: demonizing Israel and ridiculing Mazel.

The Shvitz documents a vanishing culture

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The nostalgic hit of the Jewish film festival circuit, including the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, of a number of years ago, The Shvitz has finally come to DVD.

The film, largely shot in black and white, describes the joys and pleasures of the old-fashioned steam baths and chronicles the tale of one of the last remaining public steam baths in New York.

This documentary takes the viewers behind the bathhouse doors and looks at the camaraderie of the people who frequented the shvitz on a regular basis. Many of the people who enjoyed going to the shvitz believed strongly in the therapeutic qualities of the steam, while others saw it as an opportunity to get away from the boredom of everyday life and get out of the house and enjoy a little time with their pals.

We see a lot of old timers who have spent decades enjoying the rejuvenating qualities of the shvitz. They lament the decline of these public bath houses and the quickly disappearing culture that enjoyed such simple pleasures.

The director catches the essence of a part of the culture of a previous generation. The immigrants from eastern Europe brought the shvitz with them when they came to America in the late 19th and early 20th century. For many years, going to the shvitz was one of their cherished activities, but now the whole culture is vanishing. There are few places left where the guys can get together to relax, have a few drinks, play cards and enjoy the revitalizing effects of the shvitz.

It's nostalgic and it's a look at another part of our world that will soon be gone forever.

Another film with a Jewish theme was recently released on DVD. When Do We Eat? is a comedy with an edge. Some people may find it a bit offensive and the characters stereotyped, but others may find it very funny.

It is the story of a dysfunctional Jewish American family. The father is a child of Holocaust survivors and his children have all gone their own way. One son has become a Chassid; a daughter is a sexual surrogate; while another daughter is gay. The youngest son is into drugs and slips some ecstasy into his father's wine cup before the Passover seder.

The results are often hilarious, as the father, who prides himself on running the fastest seder in the west, tries to keep his family together on this momentous evening for Jewish families.

When Do We Eat? stars Michael Lerner, Lesley Ann Warren and Jack Klugman. I can't give it a full recommendation, because it has a number of flaws, but I certainly found parts of it very funny. Check it out for yourself.

SABINA CITRON LIKENED TO EMILE ZOLA FOR NEW BOOK ON CHRISTIAN ANTI-SEMITISM

Israeli Knesset member Natan Sharansky and other dignitaries and public figures gathered recently at Jerusalem's King David Citadel Hotel for the launch of Sabina Citron's new book The Indictment, published by the Israeli company Gefen.

Citron, an Auschwitz survivor and author formerly of Toronto, was lauded for taking a fearless look at Christian anti-Semitism and how it creates a receptive audience for the Arab propaganda war on Israel. Yoram Ettinger, the Israeli ambassador to Houston, called her book "a straight shooter, shedding light on western hypocrisy."

Yechiel Leiter, senior policy analyst at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs and former chief of staff to Benjamin Netanyahu, called The Indictment a "tour de force and a courageous effort for justice" and compared Citron to Emile Zola in her willingness to speak out.

Citron, who personally pursued Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel in the Canadian courts, now lives in Jerusalem. For more about her book, please visit the website www.israelbooks.com.

Argentine Film: Derecho de Familia (Family Law), a recent award-winning film by Argentine director Daniel Burman, is scheduled for two screenings as part of this year's Toronto International Latin Film Festival, Oct. 13 through 21.

The 102-minute comedy-drama is the third in a trilogy by Burman on the theme of family relations, Jewish identity and the ever-present city of Buenos Aires. It's being shown with English subtitles at the Royal Cinema, 608 College St. (4 blocks west of Bathurst) on Sunday, Oct. 15, 9:30 p.m. and on Thursday, Oct. 19, 9:30 p.m. $10. www.tilff.com

The Jew in Film & TV: The Image of the Jew in Film and Television is a six-week course presented by Shlomo Schwartzberg, former programming director of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. The course examines the depictions of Jewish characters in the movies from the first talkie, The Jazz Singer, onward, and in television from its inception.

"It will be a fun, provocative and complex look at how Hollywood has seen and portrayed Jews over the years," Schwartzberg said. The course runs at the Nadal JCC, Monday evenings, Oct. 16 through Nov. 20, 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. The cost is $108 or $90 for members. 416-924-6211, ext. 111. Information only, ext. 606.

Jason Robert Brown in Concert: Producers Michael Rubinoff and Mark Selby present an evening with composer Jason Robert Brown and his band, the Caucasian Rhythm Kings, and special guests. A Tony award-winner, Brown has been called "one of Broadway's smartest and most sophisticated songwriters since Stephen Sondheim." Rubinoff describes the evening as "a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see Brown in an intimate concert environment." Tickets $50; VIP packages including post-show reception, $125. Monday Oct. 16, 8 p.m. Glenn Gould Studio, CBC Broadcasting Centre, 250 Front St. W. 416-205-5555. www.glenngouldstudio.com

Music in Exile: Founded in 2002, the ARC Musical Ensemble (Artists of The Royal Conservatory) is "dedicated to exploring and performing works that, through historical circumstance, musical fashion or plain serendipity, have been neglected and marginalized."

ARC explores music of Jewish composers exiled by the Nazis in two concerts at the Glenn Gould Studio, CBC Building, Oct. 14 and 15, 8 p.m. Adults $20.

ARC's Music in Exile weekend also features a lecture by German musicologist Albrecht Dumling on the German composers who remained uninvolved with the German musical status quo; and a talk by Bret Werb of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum on We Will Never Die, a huge dramatic pageant staged in America in 1943 by playwright Ben Hecht to raise public awareness of the mass murder of the European Jews. Free admission to lectures. Please call 416-205-5555 for details.

ARC recently released On the Threshold of Hope, a CD featuring the rare chamber music of Mieczyslaw Weinberg, a musician who fled Warsaw in 1939, spent most of his life in Moscow, and is considered one of the three most eminent Russian composers.

The CD was recorded as part of a three-CD contract signed with Sony BMG Masterworks for international distribution on the prestigious RCA Red Seal classical label. "Recording our first CD has been a wonderful, and artistically very rewarding experience for the entire ensemble," said Simon Wynberg, the ensemble's artistic director.

Travellers in Concert: The Koffler School of Music presents The Travellers, celebrating the life and music of folk legend Pete Seeger. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. $30 ($35 at the door). Tuesday, Oct. 24, 8 p.m. 416-636-1880, ext. 228. E-mail, kofflermusic@bjcc.ca.

Conan Doyle enthusiasts meet in Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

It's "elementary" that Toronto lawyer, author and "bootmaker" Clifford Goldfarb would be centrally involved in organizing the Conan Doyle conference that opens in Toronto next week.

A fan of Arthur Conan Doyle since his youth, Goldfarb is vice-chair of the Friends of the Arthur Conan Doyle Collection at the Toronto Reference Library and former president of the Bootmakers of Toronto, a national Sherlock Holmes society. His book The Great Shadow, a study of Conan Doyle's stories set in the Napoleonic era, was published 10 years ago.

The library's Arthur Conan Doyle Room has the ambience of a cozy Victorian parlour and holds the world's only library collection devoted to the famed British writer, who lived from 1859 to 1930. Since the collection is now 35 years old, the conference will focus on Conan Doyle at 35 when he was at the height of his creative powers.

While the literary detective Sherlock Holmes remains by far the most popular and famous of the Edinburgh-born writer's creations, he also penned science fiction, poetry, histories and historical fiction, including numerous stories relating to the Napoleonic Wars.

"Conan Doyle had a real fascination with the character of Napoleon and the battle of Waterloo," Goldfarb said during a recent interview in the ACD Room. "He once said of Napoleon, 'He was either the greatest hero or the greatest scoundrel who ever lived. Of the adjective alone can I be sure.'"

Conan Doyle's historical fiction includes The White Company, a tale of the Crusades: "I think it was the bestselling historical novel of all time, after Ivanhoe by Walter Scott," Goldfarb said. He also penned a multi-volumed history of the First Great War, later known as World War I.

An avid spiritualist, Conan Doyle participated in a seance conducted by Louis Benjamin, a local medium, during his second visit to Toronto in 1922. The visiting celebrity was especially intrigued because Benjamin was Jewish, related Goldfarb, who has co-written several papers on Jewish characters and references in the Sherlock Holmes stories.

Some years ago, Goldfarb and other enthusiasts, in conjunction with Friends of Yiddish, presented a stage version of scenes from The Adventure of the Empty House, one of numerous Sherlock Holmes stories that was translated into Yiddish in the early 20th century. The result – especially hearing the ever-genteel Dr. Watson speak and act with Jewish inflections and mannerisms – was "hilarious," he said.

"We've been looking for many years to find more stories in Yiddish translation. They don't seem to have survived."

Goldfarb, who was born in a house on Bathurst Street in 1945 and grew up above the family tailor shop on Avenue Road, expressed pleasure that Toronto should be home to the world's largest publicly accessible collection devoted to Conan Doyle. The library is planning a major exhibition of manuscript and other treasures to coincide with the conference.

Planned proceedings include a gala banquet, a program of speakers and a panel discussion in which Goldfarb is participating. "The debate is to be whether Conan Doyle can be considered a great author and whether his works can be considered great literature." Free public activities include a historic walk of Victorian Toronto and a screening of the 1979 film Murder by Decree.

The conference is slated for Oct. 19 to 22, and enthusiasts have already registered from Japan, Denmark, England, United States and other countries. For more information, visit the website www.acdfriends.org or e-mail ACD35@sympatico.ca.

Ely Matlow recruited by Mount Allison football team

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Special to The CJN

Canadian Interuniversity Sport (CIS) football fans take note – there is a new force to be reckoned with in the league and his name is Ely Matlow.

The Mount Allison University Mounties varsity squad recruited the up-and-coming football prospect this past summer. Nicknamed "The Midget From Hell," the 19-year-old Richmond Hill native has made a name for himself by consistently overcoming his physical stature to become a dominant force on the football field as a defensive specialist.

Matlow is not your typical football player, and he knows it. Standing at just five-foot-six and weighing only 165 pounds, he's not exactly your prototypical, hulking linebacker. "I could very possibly be the smallest kid in the CIS," he says with a chuckle over the phone from his new home on campus in Sackville, N.B.

At first sight, opposing players and coaches tend to write him off as a novelty or at best, a weakness to be exploited on the field. Then they actually play against him and quickly realize that he comes by his epithet honestly. For more than seven years, Matlow has made opposing quarterbacks, running backs and receivers pay for underestimating him.

The Metro Toronto Wildcat's website refers to him as a "team leader… fearless" and possessing "pound for pound toughness." And he only played summer ball for them. Not bad for a little guy from the Greater Toronto Area. It's precisely that ruggedness and determination that caused Mounties' coach Steve Lalonde to recruit Matlow for the team this past summer.

"We watched some tape on him and were very interested," says Lalonde. "Yeah, he's a little undersized, but you can't measure heart. He's got a lot of natural football instinct… things you can't teach to an athlete: attitude, work ethic, vision for the play and leadership. He's a hard worker, probably harder on himself than the coaches are. He strives for perfection all the time [and] we can take advantage of his athletic ability. He's a phenomenal player."

For his part, Matlow saw Mount Allison as the perfect opportunity to bring his game to the next level and help turn around what has historically been a woeful football program (the Mounties are 0-16 over the last two seasons), all while receiving an education at one of the country's premier liberal arts colleges. He is enrolled in the BA program, but has yet to declare a major.

"I wanted to go somewhere with a good program. I heard nothing but good things about the school," he says.

"I love it out here. Toronto is a big city and this is a small town, but people are friendly and welcoming. They're anxious and support us because they think we're going somewhere."

For Matlow, getting to this point was also a journey of discovery. From his first taste of the sport in Grade 8, on Toronto's Northern Secondary school team, Matlow knew that football would be more than just a game for him – it would be a career. What he did not know was just how much the sport would give back to him. "The game has changed my life. I wasn't that into school before," he admits.

"Once football came around, it opened my eyes and gave me new things you don't learn in everyday life. It teaches you how to respect people, how to be a family, a teammate, how to put trust in the guy beside you. I mean, you can't even do that in the real world sometimes." All of which has made believers out of his parents, Magda and Avery Matlow.

"I don't think this is a sport they ever wanted me getting into," quips Matlow, alluding to the fact that his parents may not have thought their nice, Jewish son should pursue this rough-and-tumble sport as a career. It's a sentiment he's heard all too often from the Jewish community and one he hopes to dispel and change.

"I want more Jews to get into this game. There should be tons of us playing football," he exclaims, lamenting the fact that he is the rarity among his game-playing peers.

"I want to walk into a locker room one day where half of the players are Jewish. As a people our mentality is friendlier, we don't want to hurt others." But Matlow urges Jewish parents to recognize all the positive aspects of the sport such as teamwork, character building and responsibility.

"I'd want my kids involved in this game," he says. Though that may take awhile, as he confesses that he remains "happily single."

Ely Matlow

Still, his chances of influencing a new generation of Jewish boys and girls to play the game look good. His coaches and teammates have taken to him quickly and his skills continue to impress. "He'll develop into one of the leaders on the team," predicts Lalonde. "He's a great kid to be around, a great football player… he'll be a key contributor for years to come."

Matlow is just happy for the chance to continue proving himself at ever increasing levels of play.

"There's always barriers with my size," he concedes. "But there's always one coach who believes in me and that's all it takes. Once that one coach believes, the rest of them believe. I needed that one coach to take me under his wing and let me show him what I could do. And that's what [coach Lalonde] did here. I'm thankful for that."

Odds are that pretty soon most of Sackville (and Richmond Hill) will be pleased coach Lalonde did as well.

I resolve to know the stranger

As the great philosopher Socrates once said, an unexamined life is not worth living. The new year is always a good time to examine the past and learn for the future, but this year, I'd like to exchange my usual set of superficial resolutions for something more meaningful.

Sure, it would be nice to start going to the gym again, or to take hold of my Nutella addiction and curb my shopping habits, but instead, I'd rather promise to be honest with myself and be comfortable with who I am, bad habits and all.

But there are some bad habits I'd rather get rid of for good, because not only do they damage who I am as a person, they hurt people around me.

Theses days, with Palm Pilots, wireless connections, MSN and MySpace, it's almost impossible not to stay in touch. But this constant connectedness also gives us an excuse to be too busy to return calls and catch up with old friends. So many times this past year, my answering machine reached its message capacity, and people were not able to leave me a message. It's not because I'm so popular, but because I usually only bother to check my messages about once a week. I've missed important calls from old and new friends, and from family members who have called just to keep in touch, and I'm sure I've insulted them by not calling them back.

This past year, I recognized this bad habit of mine, and since we're supposed to be apologizing for our sins, I'm truly sorry for making people feel as if I've brushed them off. My most important New Year's resolution then is to be a better friend to my family and friends.

But I think I'll also extend this warmth to strangers.

When I was a kid, I was accused of being almost too sensitive to other people's feelings. But now, not so much, and I regret that.

Maybe living downtown has hardened me against people who beg for money or people who live in hardship. Being sensitive to others is not as much about giving money to every panhandler as much as it is about sharing a smile with everyone, no matter what path they've walked on.

My brother-in-law taught me this lesson and I hope I never forget it.

Over dinner one night, he told my sister and me of a man he has come to know over the years simply by saying hello to him each day as he passed him on the street.

My sister and I questioned him, and almost ridiculed him, about being used by this stranger.

"So what?" he said. "What have I lost?"

He was right. He hasn't lost a thing. My sister and I, on the other hand have lost something. We lost our compassion.

Therefore, this year, I promise to connect with strangers, whether it be by volunteering or by simply being open to a conversation. No more avoiding eye contact because from now on, my eyes will be wide open to everyone.

I can't say exactly when I became such a social snob, but maybe my final resolution should be to rearrange my priority list and not let things such as work overwhelm me. Sure, at this age, we're all working hard to advance in our careers, but this is also the time in our life where we're shaping our values as adults. Let's get it right.

At this time of year, Jews are supposed to reflect and repent. As a young Jewish woman, reflection, recognition and repentance is the best goal I can set for myself – not only during the High Holy Days but all year round.

Israeli Couscous with Roasted Butternut Squash

1 lemon
1 1/2 lb. butternut squash, peeled, seeded, cut into 1/4" dice (may be microwaved for 10 min. to soften)
3 tblsp olive oil
1 lg onion, chopped
1 3/4 c Israeli couscous

1 cinnamon stick
1/2 c pine nuts, toasted
1/4 tsp ground cinnamon
1 c chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
1/2 c golden raisins

Preheat oven to 475°F. Halve lemon; scoop out flesh, keeping both flesh and peel; discard seeds. Cut enough peel into 1/4" dice to measure 1/4 c. Put lemon flesh in a sieve over a bowl; press with back of a spoon to extract juice. Toss squash with 1 tblsp oil and salt to taste in large shallow baking pan; spread in 1 layer. Roast in oven 15 min . or until just tender; transfer to large bowl.

Cook onion in 1 tblsp oil in heavy skillet over moderate heat, stirring occasionally, until just beginning to turn golden. Add to squash. Cook couscous with cinnamon stick in large pot of boiling salted water 10 min.; drain in colander (do not rinse). Add couscous to vegetables; toss with 2 tblsp oil to coat. Add lemon peel/juice, parsley, nuts, raisins, ground cinnamon, salt to taste. Toss to mix well.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I've recently started a new job as a salesperson at a car dealership. I've always worked in sales, but selling cars is a new field for me, and I'm enjoying it.

The only problem is that one of my colleagues is driving me nuts, and being the new kid on the block, I am uncomfortable saying anything. We have weekly meetings in which we share stories and try to motivate each other, as well as review new products and concerns. There's one guy, Arnie, who always has a better story, a better suggestion, a better joke, or a better anything! Arnie needs to have the last word, no matter what we're talking about. I feel like leaping across the room and shaking him sometimes. Other people seem to be used to it, and although they don't like it either, they seem to put up with it.

I like this place and don't want to leave, but this guy is driving me crazy.

Needs the Last Word

Dear Needs the Last Word

After reading your letter, I couldn't help feeling a little sorry for Arnie. I can imagine how irritating his behaviour is, but it's obvious that there's more here than just one-upmanship.

Arnie is insecure, immature and obviously a little clueless. He is starved for attention, acceptance and respect. It sounds like he wants to belong so badly, that he has overplayed his hand and created the opposite effect. There is probably a lot of eye-rolling among the sales team every time he comes up with a topper to a story.

A good sales team is the heart of a successful company, Salespeople in general have very distinct personalities. To succeed, they have to be bright, competitive, thick-skinned, quick-thinking, unique and patient. Put all those traits together and you can come up with some very strong personalities, not all of which will blend well.

I'm not sure that confronting Arnie would do much more than feed his insecurities even further. You need to stay focused on your job and the positive things you like. It's rare to be able to find a place where you are comfortable with every employee. If you're happy with the company, your boss and most of your colleagues, I'd say that you're doing pretty well.

Of sukkot, refugees and the homeless

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The sukkah is such an earthy and soulful part of Jewish ritual. It's something that many Jews enjoy building and using, regardless of their denominational affiliation. I hope you enjoyed building yours this year, as erecting one is an experience unto itself.

Over the years, I have seen some exquisite sukkot. One that was most memorable was a sukkah built by the Bobover Chassidim in New York. It was enormous and it was clear that the community – made up of 50,000 people in Boro Park – went to great expense to decorate the interior.

The sukkah is meant to remind us of the trek the Jewish people took through the desert and the temporary dwellings they built to survive. Many people sleep in their sukkah and eat all their meals there. Sometimes, there's an unsafe aspect to this, because bees often buzz about, drawn to the sukkah by the honey and sweets that are served to mark the season. I don't remember anybody ever being bitten, however. Perhaps we're protected by the holy nature of this Jewish cabin.

The wobbly and unbalanced nature of the sukkah inspires me, because it takes me out of my home and into nature, where I feel closer to God. The sukkah reminds me that, while we are asked to eat outside for a few days of the calendar year, there are millions of impoverished people around the world who always live, eat and sleep in hovels that are far less attractive than many of our sukkot.

In Toronto, as in other metropolitan centres around the world, the homeless can often be found existing in what they refer to as "cardboard condominiums" – places they have pieced together using our scraps.

If you were to travel to Cairo, you might come across the "City of the Dead," a very poor community of people who live among the tombstones in cemeteries. And, sadly, there are millions of people who live in cages in China. Every night, these destitute folk crawl into their appallingly tiny homes, which are frequently smaller than areas we reserve for our dogs.

And then, of course, there are people with whom we share our earth who call a refugee camp home, including two million people from the Darfur region of Sudan who have been forced to leave their villages because of the Janjaweed, a militia who are wreaking havoc on them. They live in camps such as Abu Shouk, Tawila, Kabkabiya, and Dar Zaghawa, where conditions are severe. Diseases such as cholera and dysentery are widespread. Violence and rape are pervasive.

On Sukkot, it's crucial that we enjoy the temporary hut we call a sukkah through celebration, merriment and thought. The sukkah gives us the opportunity to experience what it was like for Jews to live in a place where the wind finds its way through the cracks, and where dampness leaks through the schach – the lush branches that serve as a roof.

However, we must also remember those who don't have the luxury of going back inside once the night and the holiday is over. We must make every effort to take notice and respond to the people sitting on our sidewalks as we walk to work in the morning, and to others who are living in refugee camps with open and stinking sewage next to their decrepit sheds.

Let us hope that next year, every human being will be able to make their home permanent and enjoy the great blessing that we've been given – a sound, solid dwelling that protects us from the elements, thieves and humiliation.

Chag Samayach. May God watch over the world's refugees and homeless, and may humankind finally find the will to bring them inside.

When you've found the venue with everything, there are no questions left to ask. Or maybe just one ...

Just when you thought you'd found the venue with everything, you discovered that "everything" wasn't quite everything.

Just when you realized that the Granite Club satisfied every single item on your wish list and then some, you also realized that it wasn't just about the wish list.

It wasn't just about their state-of-the-art modern facility for up to 500 guests — ensconced in a spectacular setting — a compelling choice even before its $3 million upgrade.

It wasn't about the magnificently landscaped lawns, gardens, and terraces encircled by several acres of virgin forest.

Turns out it wasn't just about the palatial kitchen staffed by an army of distinguished chefs — including a full-time pastry chef — nor about their avant-garde creations or the culinary trends they set.

Nor, apparently, was it about the art gallery, valet parking, dreamlike French country brides room, onsite childcare services, or countless other amenities.

(L to R) Pastry Chef Renato Del Sol, Sous-Chef Ian Rodger and Executive Chef Nigel Didcock

So what was it about then?

"Every facility worth its salt has "checklist appeal," says Catering Director Deborah Muise. "Most reputable venues can walk you through their premises and make a pretty good case for hosting your event. But the bottom line is, Does it feel right? That's the question you have to ask yourself. Once you've weighed all the pros and cons, try picturing yourself in that venue. If you feel good about that picture — if you can see yourself in that setting on your special day, and feel the joy —then you'll know you've made the right choice."

At first blush it seems odd for a venue with ostensibly more to offer than any other to downplay the "wish list" factor. At the Granite Club, however, "we don't hang our hat solely on our facilities", says Muise. "If people don't feel comfortable with you, it doesn't matter how big your castle is. They need to know that when you say you'll look after them, you really mean it. This is not just another business deal. You're making a commitment, not just to host a very personal event, but to share it. And that event will only be as good as you make it."

How good are the people that make your event at the Granite Club?

Good enough to uphold a 133-year-old standard of excellence, personal service, warmth and enthusiasm that emanates from Muise and Executive Chef Nigel Didcock through the entire team of some 150 people, all focused on making your simcha the fairy tale you envisage.

Moreover, notes Muise, since the traditionally-private club began welcoming guests to host special events there, "we feel an even greater onus to measure up."

When planning an event, you normally have to whittle down your perfect-world wish list to a realistic size. At the Granite Club, you simply add to it — then enjoy a level of caring that exceeds your expectations.

Visit the Granite Club's website at www.graniteclub.com.

Newly renovated Acrobat Lounge offers wealth of culinary expertise in special event and daily dining

Take 24 years of experience as a head chef in some of Toronto's most elegant restaurants, a bundle of energy, a truckload of ambition, and a midtown setting that's at once secluded, theatrical, and romantic, and what do you get?

The brand new Acrobat Lounge at Yonge and Eglinton, that's what.

Under the direction of owner and Executive Chef Abdul Amini — late of Gladstone's, and with a long list of other prestigious dining establishments like Accesso and Bellini's on his résumé — Acrobat, nestled neatly on the second floor at 2464 Yonge Street, has just completed a major renovation that has seen its decor

Already-brisk Bar / Bat Mitzvah bookings

upgraded to match Amini's sparkling new menu while retaining the theatrical flair — complete with romantic open-air balconies — that has made it a favourite simcha spot since its inception.

Though Acrobat bills itself as a steak and seafood house, daily dining here is secondary to its principal function as an event venue.

Amini's wealth of experience in a variety of upscale dining environments and culinary genres allows him to offer a selection of special event menus that transcends stylistic and geographic limitations. And he is also able to offer Kosher meals through a special arrangement with Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers, under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Canada, C.O.R.

Kosher special event dining by special arrangement with Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers

Amini's vast culinary repertoire includes many surprises, especially the seafood section. Try the Blackened Filet of Red Snapper served with mango & papaya salsa and root vegetables, or the Sesame Crusted Filet of Tuna served on a bed of sautéed mushrooms with miso dressing and pickled ginger sauce. And his Smoked Salmon Crusted Filet of Halibut served with citrus sauce on a bed of rice cake & baby bok choy is fast becoming a signature dish. The steaks, lamb and poultry are similarly refined. The Moroccan Style Lamb Shank with Couscous is simply out of this world.

Influences from most European countries as well as the Near East, Middle East and Far East are evident in his special event menus. The preparation is painstaking, the presentation impeccable; in short, just what you're looking for in a special event menu.

Known not only for his culinary skills but also for his affable, easygoing demeanour, Amini has already hosted a number of Bar / Bat Mitzvahs since acquiring Acrobat, and expects the already-brisk bookings to increase dramatically now that the renovations have been completed. The hardwood floors have been retained but are fully refinished; the decor throughout has been similarly updated, but not at the expense of the elegant period feel that always made a visit to Acrobat feel like a glamorous step back in time.

In terms of daily dining, Amini is entering the already-crowded arena of steak and seafood dining with a full repertoire of mainstream offerings in addition to many dishes you won't find at any other steak and seafood restaurant. "People in Toronto have many choices, and they're very sophisticated," he notes. "Just offering good food and good service isn't enough any more, especially for a steak house. Everything has to be top drawer: food, service, presentation, decor, you name it. And it must be refined. The days of a steak house getting by on "nice big steaks" are long gone."

Sophisticated clientele demands refinement

Modest by nature, Amini shrinks from grandiose promises. "Talk is cheap. The bottom line is what you put on your customers' plate and how you treat them. We intend to let our food and our service do the talking."

From a service standpoint, it doesn't cost anything to be nice to people, and Amini definitely has a head start here. He and partner K. Afzal have surrounded themselves with a staff who reflect their personality: gentlemanly, dedicated to their craft, and attentive to detail.

If early indications are any barometer, Amini's makeover of Acrobat is already well on its way to being a resounding success.

On behalf of Steve Gupta, and the Easton's Group of Hotels, we look forward to hosting your Simcha.

Piano a "living, breathing" symbol of domestic completeness

You're getting married. Visions of a new life and a new home are dancing in your head. The future is music to your ears.

If you play the piano, intend to learn, or simply like listening to it, this music is both real and metaphorical.

Unique character of original designs preserved

Even if you're not a piano player and don't aspire to be one, chances are you're close to someone who is, either in your past life or the new life you're starting. Perhaps your mother or father played, or a sibling, and you've experienced the warmth of a music-filled home, and the sense of completeness it brings.

Man's best friend with music's best friend

Icons are very personal things. Mark Twain once wrote that a home without a cat "stretched with her furry belly to the sun...may be a perfect home, perhaps, but how can it prove title?" Dog lovers would confer this title on their canine companion(s). A piano owner would simply invite all and sundry to gather round the piano and enjoy the music. To him or her, this marriage of form and function is a symbol not only of domestic completeness, but of unification.

Steve Jackson knows a thing or two about pianos. In a distinguished career spanning over 40 years, Master Piano Technician Jackson has tuned and serviced thousands of pianos, and repaired and rebuilt hundreds. His client list reads like a Who's Who of the music industry. He has prepared pianos for artists such as Ray Charles, Oscar Peterson, Eric Clapton, and Anton Kuerti, and has rebuilt pianos for the University of Toronto and other schools and colleges.

During this period, Jackson's affinity with this exquisitely simple yet infinitely complex instrument has blossomed into a full-blown love affair. He has come to know it not merely as a musical instrument, but as a living, breathing extension of the creative fires that burn within us all.

Four decades of living and working with vintage pianos has given Jackson "an enduring respect for their unique qualities. Just like the musicians who play them, they all look and sound a bit different."

At Steve Jackson Pianos, he continues, "we only restore pianos with solid foundations. We take great pains to follow the spirit and character of the original piano builders and respect their designs. The result is a musical instrument with unique attributes that far surpasses in quality and character virtually all of the mass-production pianos sold today."

A Steinway Grand certified by Master Piano Technician Steve Jackson can run you a cool $19,950

Any vintage car collector would echo these sentiments. Acquiring a vintage piano, however, is considerably more affordable. In his sprawling Bathurst street treasure trove, Jackson carries Toronto's largest collection of vintage restored uprights in all styles and finishes. While true collector's items can cost tens of thousands of dollars, a serviceable vintage with its own unique sound and character can be had for several hundred.

Jackson, who served for five years as President of the Toronto Chapter of the Piano Technicians' Guild (and, coincidentally, as Gabbai of Toronto's Riverdale Shul), travels thousands of miles in search of the very best vintage pianos. A selection of Steinway, Heintzman, Baldwin, Knabe, Sohmer, Bell, Nordheimer and other fine vintage pianos are available for every budget. Each is refinished and restored with yesterday's craftsmanship and today's green technology, then certified by Jackson, who stands behind his work.

Yesterday's craftsmanship, today's green technology

The best part about buying a piano from Jackson, however — especially if you're a novice buyer — is the opportunity to get honest answers to all your questions from a real expert. With these answers in hand, you can shop around — or place your trust in a vendor with a 40-year track record of quality, value and fair business.

All of which is music to a piano lover's ears.

Canada appoints new Israel envoy

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — When Prime Minister Stephen Harper asked Jon Allen to serve as Canada's new ambassador to Israel, after Donald Sinclair stepped down from the post in August, Allen was thrilled.

"It was the assignment of greatest interest to me," said Allen, who is the third Jewish Canadian ambassador to Israel. "It is very flattering for me to be seen to be objective enough to represent my country here, despite the fact that I am Jewish."

He added: "It's always a special honour to represent your country abroad. And for me it is a particular honour to represent Canada in Israel."

His three-year term, which began only six weeks ago, marks a lot of firsts for Allen. Not only is he the first Jewish ambassador to be appointed since David Berger in 1995 but the appointment also marks the Winnipeg-born diplomat's first time leading a mission.

Jon Allen

"This new role comes with a lot of new challenges," said Allen from his new office at the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv. "Since I arrived, I have had 1,000 decisions to make about how to run this office."

He said the Israeli mission is the smallest foreign mission he has ever served on. "It just so happens that I have worked traditionally in bigger missions," he said, which have included about 350 people. The Israeli mission's staff, however, is 55 to 60. "For Canada, it's a medium-sized mission."

"In some ways, Washington [where he has served as minister of political affairs with Foreign Affairs Canada from September 2004] is hard to beat because of its sophisticated level of discourse and its number of very interesting people.

SWC Honours Fuller

TORONTO — Magazine editor Bonnie Fuller, executive vice-president and chief editorial director of American Media Inc., was given the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies' inaugural Woman of Valour award last week in Toronto, at a sold-out luncheon where she was the keynote speaker. Three Toronto women also received the honour: real estate agent Elise Kalles; philanthropist Pauline Menkes; and philanthropist Carol Grafstein, wife of Senator Jerry Grafstein. Fuller, a Canadian Jew, has led a number of magazines, including US Weekly, Cosmopolitan, Glamour and Marie Claire in the United States, and Flare in Canada.

WORLD

Guard's Plea Rejected

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court turned down the case of a former Nazi labour camp guard who said he shouldn't be deported because he has Alzheimer's. The court ruled Oct. 10 that the deportation of Iwan Mandycz, who served at the Trawniki and Poniatowa camps, can stand. His lawyers said the right that prevents the U.S. government from prosecuting a mentally incompetent person should also apply in citizenship cases.

Lawsuit Allowed

NEW YORK — A Brooklyn, N.Y., judge refused to dismiss a lawsuit against a French bank that accuses it of knowingly providing financial services to charities funded by a terror group. The Oct. 5 ruling denied a motion by Credit Lyonnais to dismiss a suit by U.S. families of victims of terror attacks in Israel from 2001 to 2003. Judge Charles Sifton made a similar ruling last month in a terror lawsuit against a British bank, National Westminster.

Town Gets Sukkah

WARSAW — Some 300 people filled the first sukkah built in the Polish city Czestochowa in 65 years. The sukkah at the Malczewski School of Fine Arts in Czestochowa was decorated by pupils, with help from Jewish students in places such as Israel and Australia. A 100-foot-long mural of Jerusalem, painted by the local students, was on one wall. Guests included Czestochowa Jews and their descendants, who were meeting in the town to celebrate their heritage.

Vandalism Arrests

MOSCOW — Russian police arrested six ultranationalists in connection with the recent vandalism of Muslim and Jewish graves. The head of the group Russian National Unity and five others were detained but not charged over this month's attack on a cemetery in Tver, 100 miles northwest of Moscow, in which more than 100 gravestones were toppled or defaced with swastikas.

Exhibit Opens

DRESDEN — An exhibit on Nazi racial theories has opened in Germany in an institution that once promoted a lethal eugenics program. "Deadly Medicine: Creating the Master Race," the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum's first exhibit to appear outside North America, is at the German Hygiene Museum in Dresden until June 24. The Nazis killed 5,000 disabled or ill children and 200,000 institutionalized Germans, mostly psychiatric patients.

Mel Is Still Sorry

NEW YORK — Mel Gibson apologized again last week for an anti-Semitic tirade during his arrest in July. Speaking on ABC's Good Morning America, the actor said his remarks were "just the stupid rambling of a drunkard." After pleading no contest to drunk driving, he received three years probation and was sent to an alcohol abuse program.

Mass Grave Discovered in German City

BERLIN — The remains of more than 50 people, many of them children, were discovered last month in a mass grave in Germany, authorities say.

Experts suspect the dead in the city of Menden were victims of a Nazi euthanasia program that murdered disabled people. Two more sites are being searched for remains.

The discovery was made by workers from an agency that cares for wartime graves. Some skulls showed signs that the victims had Down syndrome or other disabilities.

The search for the mass grave followed eyewitness reports that bodies had been transported to the site from a nearby hospital run by Adolf Hitler's doctor, Karl Brandt, who was in charge of the euthanasia program. At least 100,000 disabled people were murdered from 1939 to 1941. Protests by German church leaders brought the program publicly to an end, though parts of it continued until the end of the war.

New Dovish Lobby?

NEW YORK — U.S. billionaire George Soros is considering funding a dovish, pro-Israel alternative to the pro-Israel lobby group AIPAC, JTA has learned. Representatives of Soros met late last month with leaders of dovish pro-Israel groups in Washington, D.C., and discussed setting up an alternative to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. A meeting for potential funders is set for Oct. 26 in New York

New Shoah Sculpture

LONDON — A new sculpture by a Jewish wartime child refugee was unveiled last week at one of London's busiest train stations. Frank Meisler's sculpture recalls the Kindertransport, the 1939 trains that took Jewish children to safety in London from Nazi-occupied Europe. Meisler, who lives in Israel, came to London as a child days before the rest of his family was deported to the Warsaw Ghetto. Like most of the Kindertransport refugees, he never saw his parents again. An earlier sculpture on the site, the Liverpool Street train station, was removed last year because it had World War II artifacts that had started to deteriorate.

Ex-SS Member Freed

MUNICH — A German court in Munich freed a former Nazi SS member from custody pending a ruling on his extradition. The judge who freed Soeren Kam, 84, on Oct. 12 said he is not considered a flight risk. Kam, who was born in Denmark but holds German citizenship, is wanted for his role in the murder of a Danish journalist in Denmark during World War II. He was arrested last month at his home in Bavaria, ending decades of diplomatic limbo.

Cotler defends Ignatieff, but says he's wrong on Qana

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler quickly came to the defence of what he called Michael Ignatieff's "fundamental" views on the Israel-Hezbollah conflict, while firmly stating that the Liberal leadership candidate was wrong to call Israel's bombing in July of the southern Lebanese village of Qana a war crime.

His wife, however, was not ready to make that distinction. In a letter to the National Post published Oct. 13, Jewish community activist Ariela Cotler announced that she is renouncing her Liberal party membership because of Ignatieff's remarks.

"I feel it was not political savvy and wisdom that Mr. Ignatieff lacked… Rather it was a lack of moral integrity, sacrificing the truth for personal gains in the upcoming leadership election for the party," she said.

Her public rupture with the party came a day after her husband released a statement saying that he accepted Ignatieff's assurances to him that he believes Israel has an "unequivocal right to defend itself against unprovoked attacks and the international community must support that right," and that Ignatieff recognizes "how dangerous it is for Israel to live in a world where Hezbollah and its backers Iran and Syria, wrongly deny Israel's right to exist."

Last week's public difference of opinion between the Cotlers was the latest chapter in the furor touched off by Ignatieff's Oct. 8 comments, in French, about Qana on the popular Radio-Canada TV show Tout la monde en parle.

After several other Liberals, starting with Thornhill MP Susan Kadis, Ignatieff's Toronto campaign co-chair, were quick to criticize Ignatieff and distance themselves from him, the momentum began to swing the other way after Prime Minister Stephen Harper charged on Oct. 12 that "virtually all the Liberal hopefuls are anti-Israel."

Leadership candidate and former Ontario premier Bob Rae, whose wife and children are Jewish and who left the New Democratic Party in part because he disagreed with its positions on Israel, called the assertion "shameful, appalling, a smear and a lie," and demanded an apology.

The group called Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, co-chaired by Winnipeg MP Anita Neville, who is Jewish, and Senator David Smith, denounced Harper's comment as "inflammatory and inaccurate," as well as "unnecessarily divisive," and demanded a retraction.

"The Liberal party has a long legacy of standing alongside the State of Israel," Neville said. "The Liberal leadership candidates have all explicitly and vocally rejected the terrorist actions perpetrated against Israel in the recent conflict with Hezbollah. The candidates are committed to a peaceful and negotiated solution while at the same time explicitly rejecting terrorism.

"For the prime minister to make a blanket accusation in a country as diverse as Canada shows that he has no personal qualms about resorting to cheap shots and petty politics regardless of the truth of his accusations."

Kadis immediately resigned as Toronto co-chair of Ignatieff's leadership campaign after the National Post ran a story Oct. 11 about his war crime remark.

"Michael is an intelligent person and I would like to think that he would have a better handle on the Middle East given his years of experience on human rights and international law," she stated. "I find his unprovoked comments very troubling given the fact that the Israeli response came in light of brazen kidnappings by Hezbollah of Israeli soldiers… This was an attack intended to root out a recognized terrorist group who were raining down thousands of missiles on Israel."

Cotler, who is supporting Rae for the leadership, said Ignatieff assured him of his "unequivocal, though not uncritical, support for Israel" and that he "intended no false equivalence between Israel and Hezbollah" and thinks Canada must always side with a democratic state when that state is in a conflict with a terrorist militia.

"These are strong statements of principle and policy… I don't question these statements of principle. I question Michael's judgment in the matter of Qana."

Cotler, the former justice minister who was a McGill University law professor, said Israel's air strike on Qana was not a war crime because it was not a "deliberate and unprovoked targeting of civilians" by Israel.

Politicians and accountability

From the editor's desk

It's one of the great liberating aspects of life in a democracy that when a politician speaks, you can either believe him or not, as opposed to life in a totalitarian dictatorship, for example, where you can believe him or else.

Our politicians speak a great deal, but they don't generally say very much. Their overriding need to win voters' favour leads to the following typical patterns of public discourse:

Fear of offending often inspires a politician to avoid definitive statements or unequivocal opinions. The obsession to please, on the other hand, often leads the politician to say what he believes his audience wants to hear rather than what circumstances require that they must be told. And the need to be marketable in a television and sound-byte-dominated-age often leads him to focus on style rather than content, to practise sounding sharp rather than thinking sharply.

For all these reasons and others, to a large degree, alas, the public has tuned our politicians out. It is not surprising therefore, that politicians – along with journalists, it must be said – enjoy a relatively low ranking in the public's measure of esteem and integrity.

But there are occasions when the public tunes them back in.

The statement two weekends ago by federal Liberal leadership candidate Michael Ignatieff on the popular Quebec TV show Tout la monde en parle about Israel's bombing of Qana last summer, was such an occasion.

The chain reaction of responses that it evoked from Canadians and other politicians – colleagues and foes alike – and the resulting high-voltage media spotlight on those responses ensured that we would take notice.

Ignatieff was trying to atone for what many people perceived to be a flippant remark he made last summer about the loss of civilian life in Lebanon during Israel's war with Hezbollah, Iran and Syria. He expressed regret for his August remarks and termed them a mistake. But then, unprompted, he went much further.

"I was a professor of human rights. I am also a professor of rights in war. What happened in Qana was a war crime. I should have said that. That's clear."

Ignatieff's pronouncement on Israel's war crimes culpability crossed the boundary from a candidate trawling for voting favour into blatant self-serving expediency. It was troubling on a number of counts:

- His conclusion is not supported by the facts, let alone a legal finding.
- He appeared to go out of his way to emphasize his finding by highlighting his academic credentials and thus his authority for making his ruling.
- He appeared to have reversed his earlier opinion about Israel's conduct of war against its terrorist adversaries.
- He appeared to be kowtowing to his Quebec audience.

Not surprisingly, there was an immediate outcry from many people who objected to Ignatieff's peculiarly prejudicial pontification.

Marc Gold, the national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, wrote to Ignatieff asking that he explain his remarks.

"If your intentions were not to accuse Israel of having committed war crimes in Qana, we would ask that you issue an immediate clarification – in both official languages – that clearly sets out your view of the issue and unambiguously rejects the suggestion that Israel is guilty of any such conduct."

Ignatieff's subsequent clarification, however, was no clarification at all. He did not withdraw his statement. Rather he framed it as incidental to the "truest form of friendship" that he evidently feels for Israel. In a further effort to soften the blow that he delivered to his friend Israel, he said that both sides were guilty of war crimes during the war.

That was too much for Thornhill Liberal MP Susan Kadis, the co-chair of Ignatieff's Toronto campaign. She decided to withdraw her support for his leadership bid.

Ignatieff subsequently also announced that he will be travelling to Israel next month for a three-day fact-finding tour for members of Parliament organized by the CIC.

Ignatieff tried hard to calm the firestorm of emotions that his remarks ignited last week, but nothing helped him. Indeed, Prime Minister Stephen Harper and, of all people, Ariela Cotler too – the wife of the current Liberal MP for Mount Royal, Irwin Cotler – kept the maelstrom swirling. The prime minister accused most of the Liberal leadership candidates of harbouring anti-Israel sentiments, while Cotler very publicly and vocally turned in her Liberal Party membership.

In the winding-down campaign for the leadership of the Liberal Party, in the competing and often contradictory clang and clamour of these politicians' statements, we cannot afford to tune the candidates out.

On the contrary, we must be carefully tuned into what they say and hold them accountable when what they say portends behaviour that we would be loath to see them do.

El Al president optimistic 2006 will be a better year

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

President of El Al Israel Airlines Haim Romano, said he is optimistic that his airline will bounce back from the losses incurred due to the high cost of fuel, competition with Air Canada and of course, this summer's Israel-Hezbollah war.

He said that the start of 2006 was even more promising than the start of 2005, which was El Al's most profitable year ever, but things started to slow down in the second quarter.

"As if this wasn't enough, there was the Lebanon war. We haven't released the third quarter results yet, but I can tell you that the third quarter was not what was expected. The war affected us greatly," said Romano, who was visiting Toronto on business from Israel.

Last year, El Al netted its highest profit of $64 million (US).

"We estimate that in terms of revenue, we lost more than $70 million because of the war. In terms of net profit, about $40 million," said Romano, who was appointed by Israel Borovich, El Al's chairman of the board, in March 2005.

"We feel that we are on track again… We can see the reflection of it in our share price. In the last week or so, the share price increased by 14 per cent. The market believes in El Al, that we can come back," he said, adding that the airline launched a kind of recovery plan that would make it more efficient.

As a result, El Al no longer offers flights to and from Los Angeles. Aug. 31 was the last time Toronto served as a transit point for passengers flying from L.A. to Israel.

"I think it will be more efficient to fly to Chicago," Romano said, explaining that the L.A. route was a money-losing endeavour. "Flying to Chicago, and from Chicago to Israel will be the fastest and shortest way."

Although last year was the most profitable for El Al, Romano hasn't forgotten about his biggest Canadian competitor, Air Canada.

El Al has been flying from Canada since 1971 and was the only airline to offer direct flights to Israel until Air Canada began to do so in 1997. Since then, competition for Israel-bound Canadians has been fierce.

Romano, the former executive deputy CEO of Partner, an Israeli telecommunications company, believes that competition is healthy for the market and a benefit to the customer, but when it comes to serving the Canadian Jewish community, El Al does it better.

"The strength of Air Canada is with the 'beyond destinations' and the network that they have here. The strength of El Al is that we fly within a very convenient timetable with four flights a week, with the best timing, [large] capacity, great aircrafts, and with a great business class that we upgraded recently."

He said that Air Canada also offers four flights from Toronto, but one is on Shabbat, which limits members of the observant Jewish community to three flights a week.

"We decided after privatization that we would … not fly on Saturdays. We believe that you can be Israeli and private at the same time. It is still an Israeli company. The government has 30 per cent of the shares and our pilots, just a couple of months ago, flew in their F-16s to do their jobs in Lebanon and after they got their rest, they flew the El Al aircrafts. This is the big difference between El Al and other carriers," Romano said.

"For Air Canada, the route to Israel is just another route. For us, it is what we do."

Although the Toronto-Tel Aviv route has lost money for the airline in the past, Romano said that El Al is dedicated to serving the Canadian Jewish community and is optimistic about the future.

"The interest of the community is that El Al will sustain and increase its activity here. If we won't meet our expectations, there is a chance [the route will be terminated] because we have to think at the end of the day of the shareholders. But after a couple meetings here with travel agents I am very optimistic. I'm encouraged by their attitudes, and their willingness to do more with us."

Despite the operational costs, such as the high cost of fuel, security, and Toronto's landing fees, which are the highest in the world, Canadian fares are dropping, said Stanley Morais, the general manager of El Al's Toronto office.

In 2005, the average Canadian fare dropped by seven per cent.

"I just looked at specials that we had in the year 2000 and the year 2006 for the same period in October-November and the prices are $150 less than they were then," Morais said.

It is essential that El Al stays competitive by keeping fares as low as possible because passengers are always looking for the best price, he added.

But things are moving forward for the airline. Last year, El Al purchased two new Boeing 777s, they've leased five more new aircraft, they are continuing to upgrade the business class, and they are closer than ever in reaching a deal with WestJet to bring Western Canadians to Toronto to fly with El Al.

"We signed an agreement with Harmony, an airline that comes out of Vancouver, and we are working with them to bring passengers from Vancouver to Toronto, [to Israel], and from Tel Aviv to Vancouver via Toronto," said Morais, who added that the initial focus will be on group traffic.

While making money is always at the forefront of a businessman's mind, Romano said that what keeps him up at night is keeping his customers safe and secure, and keeping his 6,000 employees happy.

"The most important thing is security and safety. Before any business that we do, we have to take care of safety and security. This is something that can wake me at night," Romano said.

"We also have to take care of the well-being and the salaries of 6,000 families. So, you can understand that I don't sleep too much."

Despite the fact that Romano has so many responsibilities that they interfere with his ability to sleep, he still finds time to dream.

"We want to make Toronto a major destination for El Al. It is a semi-hub and I hope it will become a hub in the future. My dream is to fly to Toronto with the 777s."

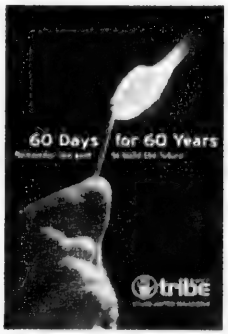
Toronto joins global program honouring 6 million

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When a loved one dies, Jewish custom teaches that mourners should study Jewish scripture in order to show reverence for the deceased and to keep their souls alive.

In honour of the six million Jews who lost their lives in the Holocaust, this custom will take place on a global scale as Jews from around the world embark on 60 days of studying 60 essays by leading Jewish writers.



The Canadian program for this "60 days for Six Million" initiative will kick off on Oct. 23 at the Westmount Community Centre City Playhouse in Thornhill, where participants will receive the free book of 60 essays.

The event will feature a speech by the originator of the global program, British Rabbi Andrew Shaw, a slide show produced by teenagers who went on the March of the Living and a musical performance by violinist Mitch Silverstein, who performed during talk-show host Oprah Winfrey's tour of Holocaust sites with activist and author Elie Wiesel this past summer.

"What makes this so unique is that it's a really hands-on project," said the man spearheading the Canadian program, Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz of the Westmount Community Shul and the Routes Jewish Centre.

"People will be learning about the issue of what Judaism is, why the six million died and... we're bringing people back to life through the study of Torah."

Each program participant in Thornhill will receive a card provided by Yad Vashem with the name and age of a Holocaust victim from the city of Lvov.

Following the Oct. 23 event, the Routes Jewish Centre will be organizing weekly lectures for eight weeks exploring topics from the essay's book.

"For a good two months, we hope to have real consciousness about the Holocaust in a positive way," said Rabbi Michalowicz, noting 5,000 copies of the book of essays have already started to be distributed in the Greater Toronto Area.

"We're not just looking back and remembering. We're actively engaging in acquiring more knowledge, which is a way of moving the Jewish people forward."

The origins of the international program date back a decade when Rabbi Shaw helped commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Holocaust by creating a book that participants studied for 50 days.

A similar event was held last year to mark the 60th anniversary, and after a presentation about the program at a rabbinical convention, Michalowicz and colleagues decided it was time to take it worldwide.

Event organizers expect about 400 people to attend and request those interested in coming indicate so with an RSVP to 905-482-9488.

Jewish Book Fair celebrates 30 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Koffler Centre of the Arts' 30th annual Jewish Book Fair, running Nov. 4 to 12 at the Leah Posluns Theatre, promises to offer something for everyone, says book fair director Helen Redner.

With about 4,000 books, and a variety of speakers and programs throughout the week, she says, there is bound to be something for every age and taste.

Redner, who has been directing the fair for 26 years, says that in honour of the fair's 30th anniversary, all events are either $5 or $10, and many are free.

Also in honour of the anniversary, a book-cover designing contest is being held for Hebrew school students.

Barbara Held, chair of children's books and programming, says that "in the past, [the bookfair] has held extremely successful contests to mark our special anniversaries. For the 20th anniversary, students designed bookmarks, and for the 25th anniversary students were asked to describe what they felt might be an 11th commandment. Entries from both contests were displayed in the foyer."

Abbas squanders moment of history

Unilateral withdrawal by Israel from lands coveted by the Palestinians is no longer on the agenda. The unceasing rocket attacks from within Gaza upon nearby Israeli settlements, the kidnappings of Israeli soldiers by terrorists operating inside Gaza and south Lebanon and the ensuing fighting in both Gaza and south Lebanon have put paid to the possibility of unilateral Israeli withdrawals.

The majority of Israelis earnestly yearn for a leader to arise from among the Palestinians with whom they will be able to at least begin the long and arduous process of reaching a mutually acceptable accommodation.

Americans, Europeans and even many in the Israeli establishment had once hoped that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen) could be that leader. Indeed, according to reports out of Washington, the Americans are convinced that Abbas can still be that leader. They are determined to prop him up until he falls finally and definitively of his own insubstantial weight or he is buried by his enemies. But most Israelis are now of the sad mind that he is not the man. He possesses neither the bravery nor the courage that his people require. He is dissembling, inept and craven.

On Sunday, the staff of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced that efforts to arrange a meeting with Abbas had come to naught. According to Olmert, Abbas had made a meeting between the two conditional on the release of Palestinians being held in Israeli jails.

"We offered to meet with Abu Mazen, but apparently he is not interested," Olmert was quoted as saying on the weekend. "He is conditioning a meeting on the release of prisoners, and we will not release any prisoners until Gilad Shalit is released," Olmert said.

The inability of the Palestinian president to set aside his transparent grandstanding to the violent, faction-driven masses can be recorded as the latest entry in a long list of his failures and missed moments.

Last week, his efforts to "moderate" the policies of the prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, Ismail Haniyeh, also failed. Haniyeh spurned even Abbas' plainly public-relations, blatantly expedient attempt to have him "recognize" Israel. Haniyeh said it would never happen, "no matter how long."

Gaza is anarchic, ruled by gun-toting bands of thugs. Palestinians have squandered the freedom to govern themselves that they gained after Israel left the Gaza Strip, much as Mahmoud Abbas squandered the numerous opportunities that the goodwill and earnest strivings of the western world and Israel conferred upon him when he ascended to power nearly two years ago. He refused to confront Hamas when his ability to do so was at its zenith. Now he confronts a rising alliance of vicious Islamist forces alongside Hamas – Iran, al Qaeda, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah – and the bleak truth of his failures as his people's condition descends despairingly to an ever lower nadir.

Oct. 7 marks Auschwitz revolt

Oct. 7, 2006, was the 62nd anniversary of the only mass revolt of the Jewish prisoners of Auschwitz.

I am a Catholic Holocaust survivor who was there while the SS were killing some of the Jews who were still alive. They were caught escaping on the banks of the River Sola. I am now 83 years old and this dramatic incident is still vivid in my mind. These brave Jews were fighting with home-made knives, bicycle chains, stones and shovels. They knew that this was the last day of their lives.

As members of the all-Polish prisoners Auschwitz Feuerwehr (fire brigade), we were sent to extinguish the burning crematorium No. IV.

Emergency dollars helping postwar Israel

I was among 40 members of our Jewish community who have just returned from a four-day UJA Federation of Toronto solidarity mission to the north of Israel. We visited Haifa, Nahariya, Metulla, Kiryat Shmonah and Kibbutz Misgav Am.

We saw the impact and devastation made by a constant barrage of thousands of Katyusha rockets on physical structures in each town and on the magnificent landscape of the Galilee.

More importantly, we saw the resilience of the people, who, after 32 days of living in underground shelters, are now going about the business of living normally, and with the greatest appreciation for the partnership of Jews worldwide – Jews who have assured them that in their hour of need, they are not alone.

There is much work being done, not only in restoring buildings to boost the economy, but also by psychologists and social workers who are committed to mending the minds and hearts of those who suffer from post-traumatic stress.

The Israelis we met all knew that Toronto was first on the scene, providing air conditioners in many shelters as a relief from sweltering heat. Our emergency dollars are continuing to help wherever there is a need. We all felt very proud to be members of such an extraordinary Jewish community.

Ashkenaz Festival

In "Epitaph for Yiddish" (CJN, Sept. 28), Rabbi Dow Marmur describes the Ashkenaz Festival as "excellent" and states that it should continue, but it is a puzzling compliment in the context of his overall indictment of Ashkenaz as a nostalgia trip.

Yiddish may not return as an everyday language, but that has little bearing on the integrity and relevance of contemporary music and art inspired by Yiddish cultural traditions. Nor does it discount the fact that there has been a considerable increase in Yiddish-language programs at major educational institutions around the world, including in Toronto, where two universities host full Yiddish-language programs.

The larger point, however, is that the Yiddish culture movement of the last quarter century has in fact demonstrated that a contemporary and evolving Yiddish-inspired culture can exist and flourish without the assurance that Yiddish will be re-instated as the Jewish vernacular. Much to the dismay of those that would have liked to forget about eastern Europe, and despite the explicit absence of its history in most Hebrew school curriculums, Ashkenaz and many like initiatives exist to ensure that this important component of our cultural heritage will not be left to wither away.

Unfortunately, Rabbi Marmur and those with like-minded attitudes make a critical perceptive error in dismissing the Ashkenaz Festival (and more broadly the entire international Yiddish culture scene) as a phenomenon based in nostalgia. It is quite the opposite, in fact. The rabbi's example of listening to, and perhaps even singing, My Yiddishe Mama as a means of "some Jews" reconnecting with their heritage is limited, and accurate for only a very marginal group. For many young people who attend Ashkenaz, and particularly for the many young artists working in this field, My Yiddishe Mama is schmaltzy anathema to what this movement is about.

Maccabi basketball

In the article "Search begins for Canada's best Jewish basketball players" (CJN, Sept. 28), it was stated that the men's open team did not medal in 2003 in Santiago, Chile. That is incorrect. The men's open team received a bronze medal, beating the hosting team, Chile. In fact, the 2003 men's open team did not have the funds to send a coach, but Ted Badner, the junior coach, and Sy Herling, the women's open coach, were instrumental in our victory.

Also, the 2006 men's open team, who were coached by Concordia's John Dore, returned from Australia with a silver medal. Canada pulled off a huge upset by beating one of the heavily favoured U.S. teams.

Perspectives

A soldier's personal Yizkor

The following is excerpted and adapted from an address delivered on Kol Nidre night to the congregation at the Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto.

By NOAM ARBEL

My name is Noam Arbel. I'll be 22 years old this week and I live in Jerusalem. I'm in Toronto visiting relatives, and this morning, I participated in the unveiling of my grandfather Arthur Zaldin's grave.

I am an officer in the Israeli army. Recently, I finished my mandatory three-year service and started a voluntary fourth year. This summer, I spent three weeks in Lebanon as a platoon commander in Tank Unit 401, fighting on the eastern front near Metula.

Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, is for many the most important day of the year – a day of justice, of decisions. Who shall live and who shall die? We ask for forgiveness for our sins over the past year. We ask to start over, looking forward to a new year and a fresh start.

Yizkor, remembering departed souls, is part of Yom Kippur too. It is when we reflect on those who have died.

At the start of the war, I was in the middle of the country. Two weeks into it, we were called up north. It was on the day before we left that Lotan Slavin died.

Lotan was an officer, a platoon commander like me, except that he had only been in his position for a few weeks. Earlier in his service, he had been a commander in the tank commanders' training school where he was my colleague for eight months, for four of which, he was my deputy.

I was the one who sent him off to officers' training. I was the last to be surprised when he finished first in the course, receiving his rank directly from the chief of staff, Dan Halutz. I'll get back to Lotan later.

I started my part in the war leaving Metula and moving west, first through a village called El-Adaisa that sits on the border, through Rab A-Talatin toward Taibe, a major town out of which many Katyusha rockets had been launched towards Israel. After spending a week in Taibe, I eventually found myself in Dir Siryan, Kantara and Hirbat Kseif, and later on, I waited to cross the Saluki river, until the call of the cease-fire and the return to Israel through Misgav Am.

None of these names should mean anything to you. Here are a few names, however, that should.

The first (well, second after Lotan) is Uri Grossman. Uri was under my command just over a year ago as a cadet in commanders' training. Uri, the son of David Grossman the author, had an amazing theatrical sense and a sense of humour that was 50 per cent Seinfeld and 50 per cent his own. He was funny, but he wasn't a joker. He was the opposite – a serious and tough fighter, not anything you would expect from a short, blond Jewish kid with thick glasses and perfect grammar. Uri was killed, along with his whole tank crew, on Aug. 12, motza'ei Shabbat, two days before the end of the war.

The commander of that tank was Bnaya Rein, another name I ask you to remember. Bnaya was 27, older than the rest of us, a fresh company commander who joined our unit two days before the war. None of us knew him that well until we saw his performance in combat. From then on, everybody did know him.

Calling himself Koach Bnaya (Bnaya Force), he was everywhere – carrying out wounded and bringing in supplies – always in the right place at the right time. When we started moving out toward the Saluki, we put Bnaya in charge of the four tanks we left behind knowing that no one could take care of them better than he.

Alex Bonimovitch

Yonatan Sharabi

Shai Bernstein

Lotan Slavin

Yaniv Temerson

Bnaya died on his way to rescue two tanks that were stuck in a dangerous spot and didn't know the way back to safety. He didn't think twice about the risk. He insisted on going alone since he knew it was dangerous.

As soon as he got to the two tanks, he was hit directly by an anti-tank missile that killed him along with Uri, Adam and Alex.

Adam was Adam Goren from Kibbutz Ma'abarot. He was supposed to finish his army service next month. He was a quiet and gentle soul, generally modest about his contribution.

Alex is a whole other story. Alex Bonimovitch from Netanya made aliyah from Belarus about 10 years ago. He came with his family and cousins as part of the large Russian immigration of the '90s.

Born in 1986, Alex was young, but he had an old spirit. He was one of the best soldiers or commanders you could meet – an old-fashioned stereotype of a man, extremely hardworking, sexist, funny, tough, aggressive and an enthusiastic, motivated Zionist.

When we got word that we were being sent in, Alex begged to be let in as a tank commander. As a new commander in the company, he was supposed to stay out [of the fighting] to replace any injured. But he wouldn't hear of it.

Alex was a man of principles. He insisted on two things:

- if Israel was under attack, he wanted to fight back;
- if his soldiers were in danger in Lebanon, there was no way he would not go in with them.

What can I say? Alex wasn't a classic hero or anything. All he did in the end was drive. One of 400 drivers in 400 tanks that participated in the war. But Alex was a role model in his spirit and motivation to us and to his family.

Another name never to forget is Shai Bernstein.

Shai was a good friend of Bnaya's, another company commander from a different regiment. Shai Bernstein's was the first tank in line, leading the entire army across the Saluki River. When one of the tanks with him was hit, he went to help and then was killed by another explosion. Much like Lotan.

Lotan was killed earlier in the war in a town called Bin J'bel where he had gone in to rescue fighters from the Golani forces who had been injured. He was hit while carrying wounded soldiers back toward the border.

Much has been said and can be said about the way the army and the government prepared for this war. But one thing cannot be protested: the bravery and persistence in guarding Eretz Yisrael.

I mentioned only people whom I knew and was with who were killed. But there were many others.

This is my Yizkor.

Who will live and who will die? It's not that clear. But it is definitely not fair.

Yom Kippur is a time worth using to put life in a more proper perspective. When I plan a military operation, I brief my soldiers and explain to them what we are looking for and so forth. However, the only way they can really understand my instructions is if I put my face next to theirs to see exactly what they see, and then show them. That's the only way for me to know their precise situation in the field.

I hope I'm helping you see things from my perspective this last summer, putting your face next to mine, metaphorically speaking, so that you are seeing a bit of what I saw.

In July and August, I was metres away from Katyusha rockets and mortars, was shot at by anti-tank missiles which missed me four times by no more than 15 to 20 metres. I drove over a landmine that lifted my tank up in the air. I treated good friends who were wounded and brought them back to Israel and dragged two bodies in a burnt tank four kilometres toward the Israeli border in order to bring them to burial. I destroyed a weapons bunker. Worst of all, I watched as rockets emptied the entire north of its inhabitants. I spent 16 days in Lebanon, showered once and changed socks twice.

I am proud of myself and my soldiers. We fought bravely. No one died in vain.

There are two key points I wish to make.

The greatest respect and honour that we owe our new Jewish heroes is to remember them and to learn from them. Moreover, we must teach from them – from their bravery, their Zionism and their personal sense of responsibility for an entire people.

We must maintain perspective. Many of us, including me, "sinned" over the year harming ourselves and others over petty arguments and irresponsibilities. We tend to deceive ourselves that our honour, our jobs, our money or our comforts are more important than life, morality, ideology, family, community and religion.

Alex Bonimovitch had a green backpack that he left at the base, which I found when we were gathering his belongings to give them to his parents. On it was handwriting with Joseph Trumpeldor's famous quote "Tov lamut be'ad artzeinu." ("It is good to die for our country.") It was sad and ironic to see it then, as the original words spoken by Trumpeldor in Tel Chai came back 80 years later, barely 10 kilometres away.

It isn't good to die for your country. It's a sacrifice one has to be prepared to make, but no parent will say it's any good. It's honourable. It's noble. But it is not good. It's good, however, to live for your country – to spend your year devoting time and attention to the things that really matter.

For perspective, I ask you to put your face next to mine.

My Jewish coffee ritual

Over the years, fasting had become increasingly difficult for me. I would get a severe headache and crippling abdominal pain. On Yom Kippur, unable to pray, I would have to go home and stay close to the washroom.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Doctors told me to stop fasting and take pills. Impossible. After all, migraines are not a life-threatening illness. What to do?

I consulted with a cousin, Rabbi Norman Lamm. He would get blinding headaches and have to memorize his Yom Kippur sermons. Eventually, he decided to eliminate all caffeine from his diet. Incredibly, his headaches disappeared. Likewise, I now begin a slow decaffeination process before the fast and no longer suffer headaches from caffeine withdrawal.

But I love coffee! I won't eliminate it completely. It's too good, too much a staple of my diet.

So I was quite pleased recently when I came across a 1989 article by Elliott Horowitz about coffee and the Jews. It seems that coffee has played a key role in Jewish religious discourse and action since the 16th century. In fact, after wine, coffee is the most frequently discussed liquid in rabbinic responsa (law).

Coffee was first exploited and then exported from Sufi circles in 15th century Yemen. Useful as a stimulant in nightly devotional rituals, coffee became popular in religious circles. Moving from the Middle East to Italy, Jews, too, found it helpful for midnight vigils and especially during the holidays of Hoshanah Rabah and Shavuot.

But at first, there were many questions about its use. Could one drink it? Was it a medicine or a food? Questions of kashrut didn't focus on the liquid itself, but rather on who prepared it and where was it drunk.

The main concern was the degree to which coffee promoted relations between Jews and non-Jews. The very nature of the popular coffeehouses was questioned. Coffeehouses were key institutions in Paris and Britain and led to many economic and social developments. But from a Jewish perspective, they were suspect – yet also frequented.

Kabbalists found it helpful in their midnight vigils. Others found it useful in enabling night-long study and other pietistic vigils. Some of these rituals had almost disappeared until the spread of coffee in the 17th and 18th centuries.

So the Jewish love of coffee is not just about good food, or our famous sobriety, as one historian would have it. It's intimately linked to our ritual need for wakefulness and stimulation.

It's kosher in all ways, fit for use.

Therefore, I feel justified in continuing an old Jewish tradition by drinking my daily cup.

Understanding the Beginning

"All beginnings are hard." An aphorism never more apt than when we begin the first parshah of the Torah, Bereshit.

The difficulty for western minds has been to understand what the first chapters signify. For fundamental Christians, the meaning is explicit. God created a world for himself in his image and He did it in six days, no waiting, no long and confusing crawl out of the primeval slime.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

This view is scientifically untenable. We know that the universe is incredibly old, that life formed over eons after earth began its fiery journey around the sun, and we know that, whoever is responsible for it, creation took a very, very long time and is still at work.

The rabbis may not have known all this, but they did intuit the fact that the first sections of Bereshit were not a science lesson, but a much more complicated message.

As I began to prepare for the new cycle, I was encouraged by my husband to look at two books that confront the difficult task of beginning to understand, well, the Beginning.

Aviva Gottleib Zornberg's The Beginning of Desire: Reflections on Genesis is a complicated book about a complex subject. She brings western philosophy, Freud, scientific discovery, traditional Talmud and chassidic texts, poetry and literary criticism to bear on the discussion until you are positively giddy with her knowledge and insights. For example, her analysis of the first commandment – be fruitful and multiply and subdue the earth – touches on the need the rabbis saw for the yetser hara'ah as the engine of increase. Dealing with the cosmic links between man and the natural world, she critiques the implicit dangers and benefits of dominance over nature versus integration with all its forms. In just one of her discourses, she brings modern philosophers, literary theorist Kenneth Burke and Rashi. And that's just for starters.

Arthur Green, in his Seek My Face: A Jewish Mystical Theology, recognizes that "Jews have abandoned Creation as a theological issue," leaving it to "Creationists among fundamentalist Christians, circles from which we are quite alienated, both socially and theologically." (Theology is really not a very "Jewish" thing, by this account. We seek questions more than answers, and theology is a lot about answers and patterned creeds, which we also are not very attached to, pace Maimonides.)

Green refuses to turn the issues of creation and the evolving nature of living beings into a purely mechanical process. "As Jews," he writes, "authors and bearers of the old Creation tale… we have a special interest in the emerging new story. We are concerned that its ultimate message be one of harmony… and not serve to justify endless conflict."

Living in Vancouver and travelling to many First Nations communities, we have heard their creation stories as well. First Nations tales of creation range from sublime to racy to comic. Many bands commemorate on their story poles the tale of the emergence of first people from animal origins, or from a mysterious underworld whose symbol is a hole in the middle of the poles. They took the harmony of man and nature seriously.

Jewish tradition emphasizes the responsibility of each for the other, as participants in the shaping of the natural world. Hence the very real challenge global environmental concerns should have for us: no matter how you read the commandment to "subdue" nature, surely what is not meant is to tamper with it until it is completely, irrevocably, broken. And today a very real risk is that instead of healing the world, we are destroying it.

We tie the creation of the world and the Exodus from Egypt together every week when we recite Kiddush. This I believe prevents us from too much hubris; as human beings we all share the same origins, a fact science now confirms. As Jews, we look forward to a new day, week, month and year in which we have special responsibilities to nurture this unique world and add to it our own personal acts of making it a better place for all.

Where are our priorities?

It was brought to my attention that over the High Holy Days the rabbi at a Conservative synagogue in Toronto took on the movement's decision to hold a vote on the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis and whether or not Conservative rabbis could perform same-sex marriages. Staunchly opposed, he suggested Canadian Conservative rabbis form their own union if the committee on law and standards (the Conservative movement's body for deciding such issues) voted to amend the current practice.

I am not here to question or challenge such views. For starters, I am not well enough versed in the matter to have a theological debate. I can only talk about myself. Second, everyone is entitled to an opinion.

However, this underscores an ever-present tension that must be addressed. Today's youth and young adults are more exposed to, and accepting of, homosexuality than ever before. On the other side, the Conservative movement is losing numbers, especially with youth and young adults. I was in synagogue over the High Holy Days; attendance by those in their 20s and 30s was abysmal.

Thus, on one side we have a growing acceptance of homosexuality. On the other, a decline in synagogue attendance and participation in organized Jewish life. Therefore, absolute pronouncements made by religious authorities can only further damage an already weakened movement. Can we afford to be so black and white?

Yes, this is no small issue, but extreme rigidity can have huge consequences that must be thoroughly considered. Does Conservative Judaism really want to be in the business of driving away even more members – many of whom, like me, want to feel at home there? Or even parents, friends or anyone for that matter, who might feel such proclamations a bit too much and that they do not belong in such a rigid community.

I know that many could respond that expressing such views is not a rejection of homosexuality as a way of life, and merely touch on gay and lesbian rabbis and marriages. That argument cannot hold. Until you are on the other side, listening to someone make an affront to your way of life, even toward just one aspect, it is not something you can judge. Why be a member in a group that will only accept your way of life up to a point?

Again, it is not the belief that is so troublesome. But preaching moral absolutism to a society where moral relativism, for better or for worse, is often the accepted norm can be very dangerous. Too much divides us already. A movement struggling over how to handle female equality, the drive of modernity and secular culture has no room for another wedge. And no, this is not an argument, as critics would point out, rooted in that exact drive of modernity or secular culture. This is an argument rooted in morality.

We preach over and over again these beliefs, which make up just a fraction of our identity and what it means to be Jewish. Often, the big picture gets forgotten.

Put the emphasis on growth. Call out for more Jewish homes to light Shabbat candles. Ask for more couples, gay or straight, to send their children to day schools so that the coming generation will have a strong Jewish identity. Teach the Ten Commandments because not enough of us know them or adhere to them. And lastly, preach tolerance – tolerance for those who strive to live honest, menschlich, Jewish lives. Do not cast shadows over people you have never met – nothing could be more un-Jewish.

Self-hatred and disillusionment in Poland

The compelling story of blurred identity that Heather Laskey tells in Night Voices (McGill-Queen's University Press) turns largely on the bittersweet reminiscences of Stanislawa (Stasia) Alapin Rubilowicz, a Jewish woman from Poland who currently lives in Canada.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Her life – shot through with upheaval, terror, uncertainty, idealism, betrayal, self-hatred and confusion is a cautionary tale about a period in Poland's history when a fervent belief in communism supposedly heralded the dawn of an egalitarian society free of anti-Semitism.

Rubilowicz, a medical doctor whose original surname was Grynbaum, was born in Warsaw in 1915 and raised in an ardently assimilationist milieu. The vast majority of Polish Jews, including my own parents, were proud of their rich traditions, which stretch back a thousand years. But the Grynbaums broke that mould with a bang.

"At Easter, we painted eggs," she recalls, offering one of the first clues of their estrangement from their roots."Christmas was celebrated as in any Polish middle-class home with gifts waiting under the candle-lit pine tree and a big dinner with a glazed roast ham. And on All Saints Day we visited our dead in the cemetery – the Jewish cemetery."

And then there is this: "[We were] so well assimilated that there was never the slightest sign of the Jewish religion in my upbringing," she observes. "I knew nothing about it. I never saw anything to do with Jewish holidays… nor did I hear anyone speaking… Yiddish.."

Steeped in Polish culture, history and literature, she was a Polish patriot to the core. "We were imbued with pride in Poland's tragic yet heroic past."

Her father, whom she adored and describes as perfect, was an importer of foreign films and the owner of movie houses. Her mother, Irena, an actress, is one of the dominant characters in this intriguing book.

When Rubilowicz was a teenager, Irena divorced her husband and married Karol Adwentowicz, a distinguished Polish theatre director 22 years her senior. To marry him, she converted to Roman Catholicism and took her mother's maiden name, Stange, which did not sound Jewish.

In yet another step designed to extinguish her Jewish background, she adopted a stage name, Grywinska, which sounds very Polish. But Irena wanted more. "She pressed me to convert to Catholicism," Rubilowicz writes, "so that I would become more Polish, or perhaps so that I would not be a source of potential embarrassment for her."

Rubilowicz, who lived with her father after the divorce, refused to comply with her wishes. Yet Irena had already twisted her self-esteem, engendering in her "a distaste for anything Jewish."

Though ambivalent about her Jewishness, Rubilowicz followed in her father's footsteps. His attitude was, "I was born a Jew, and I shall die a Jew." At the insistence of Irena, however, Rubilowicz sat in on Christian religious classes at school.

In the mid-1930s, when a wave of anti-Semitism swept over Poland, Rubilowicz began her medical studies. She had been insulated from anti-Semitism until then. But at Warsaw University, she and other Jewish students were forced to sit on "ghetto benches," which had been introduced under pressure from a minority of pro-fascist students.

Refusing to submit to this indignity, she and a group of her fellow Jewish students stood during lectures. In solidarity, four non-Jewish left-wing students joined them.

Most Polish students in her class were simply indifferent to the crass anti-Semitism, and this shocked the naive Rubilowicz. "It was not until then, at university, that I realized that we so-called assimilated Jews were left in the cold, in a no-man's land, neither nor there – Jews living like Poles, rejecting a Jewish life, but in turn rejected by the Poles."

Due to the violence on campus, her first husband, Bolek Alapin, a Jewish leftist like herself, escorted her to class.

The anti-Semitic atmosphere dented her self-confidence. "We thought we could push through the wall of prejudice… and hatred. But it was too thick, too strong to be penetrated," she muses. Yet Rubilowicz continued to believe that Polish society would accept her as an equal.

A case in point: Two-timing her husband, she dated a Polish army cadet. But when he discovered she was Jewish, he severed the relationship. By then, her first husband had left her.

World War II shattered more of her illusions. As she puts it, "I was no longer a Polish woman; they, the Poles, were looking at me with contempt. I was Jude, Zyd, a Jew. Never again could I feel that they were my people. The disdain in their eyes made me a lifelong refugee, forever a person without a country, without a place."

Stanislawa (Stasia) Alapin Rubilowicz

Rubilowicz escaped into the Russian zone in Poland, but soon was back in Nazi-occupied Warsaw. Her status in the Warsaw ghetto was peculiar. "We were… conspicuous by our manner and pure Polish speech, and here, unable to understand or to speak Yiddish, we were deaf mutes… The irony was that we had been rejected from Polish society because we were Jews, and now, in the ghetto, we were… again rejected."

Although, as a doctor, she was better off than most Jews in the ghetto, she quickly realized that her son, Peter, was in mortal danger. With the big deportations having begun in 1942, Irena, living as a Christian in the Aryan part of town, agreed to shelter Peter. He was smuggled out of the ghetto.

Shortly afterward, Rubilowicz, overwhelmed by hopelessness, tried to commit suicide. After recovering, she escaped from the ghetto, and just in time, too. The patients in her hospital were murdered and the physicians were deported to Treblinka. She never saw her beloved father again.

With her mother's and stepfather's help, she found shelter and a new identity as Irena Ponikowska, a deceased Polish Catholic. As an extra precaution, she bleached her brown hair and wore a crucifix.

Even so, she was almost "outed" as a Jew.

Thanks to Polish friends who never wavered in their loyalty, Rubilowicz was placed on a farm near Warsaw. But even here, relatively far from prying German eyes, she felt the sting of anti-Semitism when members of a Polish partisan band boasted of killing a Jew hiding in the forest.

Liberated in August 1944 by the Red Army, she joined the reconstituted Polish army as a doctor under her real name. She was then reunited with Peter, who had been cared for by nuns in a convent. "I'll never forget this moment, the happiest in my life," she writes.

Unlike many Polish Jews, Rubilowicz remained in Poland after the war, eager to build socialism. But hope soon gave way to disappointment, as her efforts to charge a woman who had denounced her to the Gestapo came to naught and as Peter was tongue-lashed as "a dirty Jew" by a classmate.

In 1949, she married Mietek Rubilowicz, and they lived comfortably in Warsaw. But she was soon disenchanted with communism. "The turning point for me was the so-called Doctors' Plot in the Soviet Union," she says.

But growing anti-Semitism in Poland, manipulated by the cynical Polish government for its own ends, was a crushing blow as well. "I couldn't have anticipated that the virus of anti-Semitism would survive after the horrible war, when millions of Jews had died on Polish soil," she notes dejectedly.

As a result, she decided to leave Poland and settle in Canada. Mietek, a loyal communist, was reluctant to emigrate. But he consented when Rubilowicz agreed to immigrate to Israel. (Bolek, her first husband, left Poland, too, and settled in London, England, in the Polish emigre community. He had already converted to Christianity, and when he died, he was given a traditional Polish funeral, "as accorded to real Poles.")

After a difficult period of adjustment, she finally accepted Israel as her home, feeling she belonged there. Her mother, now a grand dame of the Polish theatre but still uneasy about her Jewish origins, visited them in Israel, but told friends she had been to France.

Rubilowicz eventually soured on Israel, unable to cope with the constant strife in the Mideast and angry over Israel's treatment of Israeli Arabs. She went to Canada – where Peter had immigrated – to spend her last years quietly in "a peaceful, tolerant democracy." To please her, Mietek joined her in Canada.

Rubilowicz's mother died before she settled in Canada. When she arrived in Poland for her funeral, she discovered that Irena's quest to mask her Jewishness had created a ludicrous situation. Laskey, who met Rubilowicz after making a CBC Radio documentary about her memories of World War II, describes the funeral arrangements at length.

She leaves us in the dark about Rubilowicz's current status in Canada, but sheds much light on the pathetic pathology of self-loathing.

Learning never stops for experienced educators

By A.M. Segal

In her 30-plus years as a teacher, Margot Levitt has learned a great deal about how to inspire kids and help them learn.

But even as a veteran, the grade four Associated Hebrew Schools educator still feels there's more to learn and that's why she enrolled in a new Professional Development Course (PDQ) offered by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

"Professional development is dialogue," said Levitt. "PDQ classes are small so there is time for discussion as well as the opportunity to speak about our struggles and listen to other teachers."

The classes, which began in the summer and continue throughout fall and winter, concentrate on enriching teaching practices, exploring educational issues and understanding the culture of the Jewish school setting.

"We want to engage these experienced teachers and invigorate them," said Laura Wiseman, a BJE educator. "The aim is to help educators become reflective practitioners who ultimately affect the quality of learning for our students."

Board of Jewish Education teachers learn new skills at a recent Professional Development Day.

The course Levitt is taking is entitled, "It's not the 'what' – it's the 'how.'" Taught by educational consultant Dori Levine, the course guides teachers towards going beyond merely presenting content to actually understanding 'how' to teach it in a way that connects with a diverse group of students.

"Nowadays, there is more complexity in the job and teachers are being asked to deal with children with varied backgrounds and varied levels of performance," explained Levine. "That means they need a new understanding of how to deal with these different levels and operate to bring about change in the child."

As an incentive to enroll in these classes, teachers who participate in seven units of PDQs are invited to take part in a free, 10-day summer seminar in Israel.

"The seminar in Israel is planned by BJE educators and facilitated by local experts in education in Israel," Wiseman said.

Rabbi Eric Levy a perfect fit for Ulpanat Orot

By Carla Lancit

This fall, the students at Toronto's Ulpanat Orot girls school, with a religious Zionist philosophy, are adjusting to two new things –Talmud study, and Rabbi Eric Levy.

Levy, the school's new principal, oversees Jewish studies and, together with the school's board, created the new Talmud track. "Talmud wasn't being taught formally in the school before this," says Levy. "When they asked me to come on board, it was clear they wanted me to do this."

Teaching Talmud isn't new to Levy. Prior to his appointment at Ulpanat Orot, he taught Jewish studies at Rae Kushner Yeshiva High School in New Jersey. Rabbi Levy is also an internationally respected Jewish educator, who served in the Israeli army tank corps. His classes and lectures on Torah topics are widely available on the internet.

At Ulpana, Levy is teaching ninth grade Talmud and a twelfth grade course in biblical poetry. He's still adjusting, however, to the idea that his responsibilities now extend beyond the classroom. "The hardest part is coming out of the classroom and being able to affect kids directly and indirectly. You have to take a step back and remember that your job is to educate all the kids—not just teach them."

Levy is impressed with the dedication of the school's students and staff. "The girls want to learn—both Torah and otherwise. The teaching staff is great. Things have been going very smoothly."

The feeling is mutual. "I'm very excited at what I see," says the school's general studies principal Frank Samuels. "There's an energy in the school, an enthusiasm. He's a tireless worker, and I believe the path and directions that have been set are encouraging and will result in the school being stronger as we move forward."

Samuels notes, in particular, Levy's emphasis on tefilla (prayer), accountability, and embracing technology where it assists education. "We now have a student-accessible wireless internet environment, and we've already had two video shiurim (lessons) with Rabbi Leibtag in Israel through Torah in Motion."

The creation of the Talmud track is in keeping with the philosophy that Orthodox girls should receive the same education as their brothers. In fact, Levy notes that the curriculum at Ulpanat Orot closely matches that of brother-school Or Chaim. "We teach them the same Talmud as the boys. We teach them Gemara, and in Navi (Prophets) we're doing the same material," says Levy. "We want them to have the exact same educational opportunities as boys do when it comes to Torah knowledge."

NOAR forges connections between Jewish youth and community

Since he was a child, Justin Tock has dreamed about visiting Israel. So when he learned that Young Judaea was offering an extensive five week trip to the Holy Land for the summer of 2006, he was keenly interested.

But there was one potential problem - money. "There's a reasonably good chance I would have been held back because of financial constraints," noted the Northview Heights Secondary School student.

Fortunately, money didn't stand in his way thanks to a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto scholarship arranged in conjunction with NOAR, a Board of Jewish Education initiative, which helps provide a wide array of "experiential education" programs for Jewish youth.

Camps, youth groups and Israel experiences, such as tours and study opportunities, are some of the key programs NOAR provides in order to nurture Jewish identity and community connections.

Tock, who had attended NOAR-affiliated camps for six years prior to the Israel trip, is grateful the scholarship was awarded to him.

"I had never been to Israel before, so finally getting the chance to go was such a privilege," he said. "Seeing and experiencing historical and beautiful sites for the first time made it really moving."

Since starting up two years ago, NOAR – which means "youth" in Hebrew - has helped bolster programs like Tock's Young Judaea experience in Israel through a variety of efforts, particularly financial assistance and professional development for youth professionals.

For summer camps, NOAR has played a major role in developing the Ontario Council for Jewish Camping, a collaborative forum for camps.

"We discuss common camping concerns and NOAR has provided professional development support on the camp grounds," said NOAR director, Dani Fine.

"It gives us an opportunity to meet, share expertise and open ourselves up to working together which we've never done before," said Risa Epstein, national executive director of Canadian Young Judaea and director of Camp Solelim. "It's given us a real voice in the community."

For the future, NOAR is aiming to build on the progress of the last two years by launching new programs and enhancing existing ones.

"By offering our services to a wider group of Jewish youth while they're young, the community will have them forever," said Epstein.

Toronto youngsters such as these are taking part in a number of Israel experiences thanks to NOAR.

Toronto students stand with Israel

By Carla Lancit

When Dan Held returned from summer vacation, he was met by a slew of emails from students with ideas of how to respond to the recent war in Israel.

Held, the student activities director at Tanenbaum CHAT Richmond Hill, wasn't surprised. CHAT's students have strong connections to Israel and the students initiate many of the school's activities.

CHAT started the school year with an assembly covering not only the events of the summer, but background and history as well, to ensure that the students were properly informed. "Then we moved into am echad b'lev echad mode (one nation with one heart) and we stand with Israel," says Held. But support for Israel isn't a one-shot-deal. The students are also working with a high school in Kiryat Shmona that was bombed, so far raising more than $1,000. "It was an outpouring of their empathy and support for Israel," says Held. In addition, the school's teachers are incorporating aspects of the war into the curriculum.

"The summer has been a challenge for the schools to translate 'we stand with Israel' into a meaningful message for students," says Natan Kandler, a Jewish Agency shaliach (emissary) who works with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

The BJE held a workshop in order to assist the schools, during which participants discussed how to bring Israel into the schools in a meaningful way. The workshop also offered school principals resources to do so.

Each school has responded to the challenge in its own way. At Netivot HaTorah Day School, each grade is being twinned with a family in northern Israel.

"Everyone feels a concern," says vice principal of Jewish Studies Rabbi Elliott Diamond. "We have a lot of connections, and, in a time of war, our concerns are that much more intense."

At Associated, the situation in Israel is being covered in both the formal and informal curriculum. In the first two weeks of school, the students learned songs of peace and hope and prepared banners. The preparation culminated in a rally for all 1,700 Associated students. "We all marched and rallied for Israel with flags, and all the children sang songs," says Kathy Friedman, principal of the Kamin campus. "It was a powerful voice."

"I think it's very meaningful when a youngster recognizes that Israel is part of his or her identity," says Kandler. "The war may have been over there, but it affects us here as well."

1,700 students from the Kamin Campus of Associated Hebrew Schools participated in a recent rally where they marched in support of Israel.

Agreeing on a Jewish education is an important first step

By Daniel Horowitz

When my wife Elana and I were married two-and-a-half years ago, we, like many couples, didn't exactly see eye to eye on everything. Okay, to be perfectly honest, we agreed on very little. One issue in particular stood above the rest, however: how we were going to educate our beautiful 17-month-old son, Eli.

I always thought to myself - I'm a good Jew, my wife's a good Jew, we're both pretty well educated and, with or without a Jewish education, Eli's going to be the same. I always saw my son going only to our neighbourhood public school with kids of all backgrounds, learning about life. After all, I pay taxes that go to support that school, so why shouldn't I send my son there?

Not impressed with my logic, Elana had other plans. She is adamant about the importance of a good Jewish education.

Daniel and Elana Horowitz have many questions to be answered [illegible] Eli's future Jewish education choices.

"Although my brothers and I went to public school, I wholeheartedly believe in Jewish education," says Elana. "I feel that in today's world, it's crucial to send our kids to a Jewish school. I've always regretted not having a formal Jewish education and it's my wish for my son to be in a classroom where he learns the crucial subjects like math and English, but also Jewish history, language, culture and prayer, so that he is enriched with a strong Jewish identity."

The more I spoke with my wife, and the more I thought about it, the more I had to admit that she was right. I would love nothing more than to have Eli lead our Shabbos meal in the future, maybe even teach old dad how to daven properly in shul down the road.

There is something fundamentally reassuring and calming about the thought of my son learning, from day one, who he is as a Jew, and what that means in the grand, cosmic scheme of things. He'll probably even thank me for going along with his mom on this one.

Now that we've agreed on something (finally), the next step is investigating the incredible myriad of educational options out there. So, the two of us will be attending the upcoming Jewish Education Fair, and, who knows, maybe Elana and I will even agree on which pre-school is right for Eli.

Teach your children well: Don't miss the Jewish Education Fair

On Monday, October 23, parents with questions about Jewish education choices for their children will be making their way to the Tanenbaum CHAT Wilmington campus to take part in the Jewish Education Fair.

The renamed Fair – known in previous years as Options in Jewish Education – is sponsored by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto, part of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage of UJA Federation.

This year's fair will be bigger than ever before with representatives from more than 25 educational facilities, representing day schools, pre-schools and supplementary education, available to answer questions about the range of educational options available throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

For more information about the Jewish Education Fair, visit www.bjetoronto.org (click Jewish Education Fair on the right hand side) or call 416.635.5600.

JVS Toronto celebrates its 60th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As part of its 60th anniversary celebrations, Jewish Vocational Service Toronto unveiled six storyboards at its annual general meeting that highlight the organization's history.

Arranged by decades, the storyboards begin in 1947 when community leader Max Enkin led a group of businesspeople in creating the organization, and the storyboards trace the organization's growth decade by decade into the new millennium.

Karen Goldenberg, JVS Toronto's president and CEO, said that because a lot of archival information has been lost over the years, she and a group of volunteers have been attempting to retrace and document the agency's history.

"Volunteers are interviewing former clients and agency leaders and are trying to get as much information as possible. Our plan is to put together a celebratory book, which will be presented at our 60th anniversary gala, next October."

Goldenberg, who also serves as president of the International Association of Jewish Vocational Services (IAJVS), said JVS is also trying to tie its history to that of similar agencies throughout North America.

"[Most] agencies started up before the war when Jews began coming to North America, and there has never been competition among us. We share information across the network."

Like the other IAJVS members, she said, the Toronto agency was founded to serve uniquely Jewish needs and thwart anti-Semitic hiring practices.

By the 1950s, though, it was serving the entire community, and in the following two decades, it created a rehabilitation workshop for clients with physical or mental disabilities, and eventually began offering career counselling, as well as education and psychological services.

JVS's storyboards

Currently in 14 locations, JVS assists more than 20,000 people a year, she said, including new immigrants, youth, women, people with disabilities, mature workers, as well as the unemployed and underemployed.

Book cover design contest set for 30th book fair

This year, students from grades 1 to 3 are asked to design a book cover about a Jewish holiday; grades 4 and 5 will design a cover about a Bible story; and grades 6 to 8 will design a cover about remembrance.

"Although we will be presenting a prize in each category, each entry will have a place of honour in the theatre foyer," said Held.

Redner says that there are a number of children's programs being held, including a reading on Nov. 5 at 10 a.m. of Kvetchy Boy by author Anne-Marie Baila Asner, followed by interactive bookmaking for children 5 and up.

At 3 p.m. on Nov. 5, author Kathy Kacer speaks about her latest book, Hiding Edith, the true story of a young Jewish girl sent to live in the French town of Moissac after the Nazi invasion of France.

"We want kids to be aware of some well-written prize-winning books that revolve around a Jewish theme," says Redner.

She says that throughout the year leading up to the fair, the board of about 30 people look over thousands of books and decide what will showcase well.

A number of the books have been written by the children of Holocaust survivors such as Bernice Eisenstein, author of I Was a Child of Holocaust Survivors, who speaks on Nov. 8 at 8 p.m, says Redner.

"There has been a revival of these books, because as these people reach 60 years old, they are starting to lose their parents, and are trying to pass on the experience of growing up in such a home."

Two speakers are basing their talks around the 90th yahrtzeit of Sholem Aleichem, says Redner.

On Nov. 5 at 1:30, Eugene Orenstein speaks in Yiddish and English, at the Shloime and Fannie Steinhart Yiddish lecture, on "Wisdom and Grace, Sholem Aleichem's Humour: A tribute to his 90th yahrtzeit."

On Nov. 12 at 1:30 p.m., Nathan Garnick presents a literary review in English and Yiddish on the legacies of I.L. Peretz on his 90th yahrtzeit, and Sholom Aleichem.

With so much to offer, says Redner, visitors to the fair often buy tickets in multiples.

JUMPING FOR JOY: For the second year in a row, Bialik Hebrew Day School elementary students in grades 1 to 5 participated in the Heart and Stroke Foundation's Jump Rope for Heart event. Students learned about healthy eating and enjoyed planned physical activities related to skipping. They raised funds for research into causes and treatments of heart attacks and strokes. Torah in Motion conference at Shaarei Shomayim

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The fifth annual Renewing Our Spirit; Self, Family, Nation, conference of Torah in Motion takes place at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on Nov. 4 and 5.

The event is held in memory of Nathan Noteh Krauss.

The program begins Saturday night, at 8:15, with a panel discussion titled "Engagement and Disengagement: The future of Religion in the Land of Israel," moderated by Elliott Malamet. Panellists include Rabbi Chaim Brovender, dean, Ohr Torah Stone Colleges in Israel; Adam Ferziger, associate director, graduate program contemporary Jewry, Bar-Ilan University in Rehovot; Rabbi Pinchas Hayman, an expert in Talmud education; and Rabbi Francis Nataf, educational director, David Cardozo Academy in Jerusalem.

Subjects to be dealt with on Sunday include blogs; the shift to the right in contemporary Orthodoxy; the relationship between the Orthodox and the non-observant; Jewish education; Jewish meditation; and religious censorship in the information age.

Participants will include Rabbi Gil Student, who operates the HirhurimMusings blog; Samuel Heilman, professor of sociology at Queen's College in New York; Rabbi Daniel Feldman, a rebbe at Yeshiva University; Rabbi Marvin Schick, president of Jacob Joseph School in New York; and Mindy Ribner, founder and director of Beit Miriam, a centre for spirituality and meditation

Cost of the full program is $40, which includes lunch. Saturday night or any single session is $15. Cost after Oct. 30 for the complete program is $50.

For more information, or to register, go to www.torahinmotion.org, or telephone 416-633-5770.

Fertility expert to speak at Kehila Centre

"Be Fruitful and Multiply: an issue of sensitivity within the Orthodox community," will be the topic of a program at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill, Oct. 22, at 8 p.m.

The speaker will be Dr. Baruch Brooks, an embryologist and religious supervisor in the newly opened in vitro fertilization unit at Shaare Zedek hospital in Jerusalem.

Program set for October 22

Brooks, who is involved with PGD, the pre-implantation genetics program, performs biopsies on embryos.

As well, he is the head of Zir Chemed, a resource for fertility advice. The organization runs a fertility clinic and laboratory in Jerusalem, which operates according to Halachah.

Brooks earned his PhD at the Institute of Psychiatry, London, in brain biochemistry. He and his family made aliyah in 1983, where he studied at a kollel for two years. He then took a post-doctoral position at Shaare Zedek.

He travels extensively to England, the United States, and Canada, lecturing and counselling.

While here, he will be available for private consultation with couples experiencing fertility issues. To book an appointment, call Shari, 905-660-9281, or email Brooks, at drbrooks@netvision.net.il.

The program at the Sephardic Kehila Centre is in memory of Isaac Kozlowski. It is sponsored by the Kehila Centre and Westmount Community Shul. For more information, call Shlomo, 905-669-7654, ext.223.

Jewish Life

We need baseless love and unity

By RABBI AVRAM ROTHMAN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

In the Torah's description of Creation, found prominently at the start of this week's parshah, we see that the Almighty looked at his daily activities and proclaimed, "and it was good." However, when He gets to the second day of Creation, the Torah does not use the expression ki tov ("it was good").

What was wrong with the second day of creation that it should be singled out from all the other days that were all described as ki tov?

The midrash explains that the reason the Almighty doesn't say that his work on the second day of Creation was ki tov is because on that day, He created division. Division, as one might expect, is not considered good. To divide people – to separate one person, for instance, from another – is the cause of fighting, arguments and plain old Jewish machlokes. The midrash lets us know that division is just not good.

Where do we see that HaShem created division? The Torah teaches us that on the second day of Creation, God separated the waters above from the waters below, thereby creating the first division in the history of Creation.

Or was it?

A little earlier in the Torah, we see that on the very first day (about which HaShem certainly declares "and it was good"), HaShem actually separated light from darkness. This division clearly seems to have been made even earlier by HaShem and, therefore, raises a real question for our midrash.

The answer is that on the first day, HaShem divided two significantly different things – light and darkness. That, the midrash seems to hint, is not a problem. The world needs separations. Separations between very different types of things, such as good and bad, are actually good.

However, on the second day of Creation, the Almighty separated the waters above from the waters below. Even though the waters were in different places, they were both water. This is the first place where God creates a division within a like object.

To separate two different things may not be bad, but creating a division in a like object – an artificial division, if you will – is not good at all.

This's the point of the midrash. HaShem did not say "and it was good" when He made a division in the water. Dividing the water is like dividing Jews – like things that should never be divided. It's not good.

The message is clear: separation in the world is necessary, but division between like things, such as among Jews, can never be called good. We can't consider that living with infighting among Jews will ever be good.

I'm sure we can agree that the Torah gives us this message right from the start so that we should never become confused and think that divisions and infighting between Jews are acceptable. Regardless of which shul you belong to (if any), or what school you send your children to, or what kind of kippah you wear (if any) or what neighbourhood you live in, you need to know from the start that infighting and divisions are simply not acceptable to the Torah.

Jewish history is replete with examples of baseless hatred, needless divisions and fighting among Jews. It's the cause of the murder of Abel by Cain early in the history of the world, as well as the selling of Joseph by his brothers and certainly the destruction of the Second Temple in Jerusalem. We still live under the shadow of the baseless hatred between Jews that caused that destruction, and led to us being dispersed throughout the world.

Clearly, the Torah is telling us – appropriately, at the very start of Creation – that fighting, hatred and all forms of divisiveness are to be avoided, and that they're ultimately the cause of great pain, sorrow and destruction for Jews and for the world itself.

May we learn from this and take to heart our need to follow the teaching of the first chief rabbi of the State of Israel, Rabbi Avraham Kook, who said that the way to combat baseless hatred and divisiveness is with baseless love and unity. May we be blessed with the foresight, energy and ingenuity to accomplish that and bring Mashiach speedily in our time!

Trick or treat? No thanks

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I'm the Jewish Grinch who stole Halloween. I'm a parent whose kids have never gone trick or treating. Why? Because context matters.

Halloween is a sacred day in the Catholic calendar. Candles for the dead are lit in Catholic churches on the evening of Oct. 31. Nov. 1, "All Hallows Day" (or "All Saints Day"), is a Catholic holy day. In the earlier pagan world, it was believed the disembodied spirits of those who had died the preceding year would come back in search of living bodies to possess for the next year. Those still living did not want to be possessed, so on the night of Oct. 31, villagers would extinguish the fires in their homes to make them cold and undesirable, then dress up in ghoulish costumes and noisily parade around in order to frighten away spirits looking for bodies to possess.

"OK," you might say, "That's ancient history." But since history is so important for us as Jews, shouldn't it be important when it's somebody else's?

Even if we ignore the holiday's origins, I'd still wonder about the point of it. What are the values, customs and messages of Halloween that my kids would imbibe?

• Gimme candy. The Jewish way is to give: on Purim, we go house to house delivering sweets, not asking for them. I'm happy to fill my kids' lunchboxes to the brim with little candy bars all week after Oct. 31. I can buy them from the store. My kids don't have to go door to door begging strangers for them. If the neighbours I know and trust want to give a treat to my kids, they can do so any time of the year, as a gesture of friendship.

• Dead people are scary. Although we have the occasional folkloric tale of evil spirits, such as the Dybbuk, Judaism doesn't teach us to fear death, graveyards or the dead. I don't want my kids to be afraid that their late grandpa will come back to harm them, or that they should be scared to visit a cemetery.

• Old women are witches, hags, and harmful. As a feminist – and one growing older every year – I find the images of old ugly women with warts riding broomsticks totally offensive. Have you ever noticed how much those caricatures resemble the caricatures of Jews from the Middle Ages – of baby eaters with hooked noses, tails and wicked grins? It's not an accident.

• Witches are devil worshippers. Witchcraft is part of an ancient religion called Wicca. There are practising Wiccans today. They don't worship the devil or demons. In fact, they preach a dignified spirituality and respect for the Earth and all its creatures. I wouldn't want Jews portrayed the way witches are portrayed. For centuries, witches had been persecuted and killed, like Jews, in the name of religion. Most of those witches were women practising ancient herbal cures and midwifery that was considered threatening by the male establishment. Do I want my kids growing up unaware of the stereotypes they are perpetuating?

• If people don't give you what you want, you can hurt them. Throw eggs on their doors or their cars. Kids are warned to go out only with parents or older siblings. Police are on call all night. You can't trust a treat that's not store-bought and hermetically sealed. What kind of "holiday" is it when I have to fear for my kids' safety?

So what does our family do? We go to the movies or bowling. It's great fun we're usually the only ones there, and afterward we go out for dinner and ice cream sundaes. The kids actually look forward to it. The week after Halloween, we buy face paint and wigs at half price for Purim.

Meet you there?

Jewish Life

Matrimonial assets

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

One of the hallmarks of Western society is the distinction between the legal and ethical realms. It's the height of political incorrectness to pass judgment on another person's moral choices. The extent of this dichotomy was evident in a recent news story about the high-profile divorce of a recently retired hockey player, allegedly due to an affair with a member of Parliament. The story quoted family lawyers who stated that adultery is no longer a factor that courts take into consideration when allocating financial assets to each party when a marriage fails.

Judaism takes a much different approach.

Issues of morality often have legal and financial consequences. While Judaism basically has a no fault divorce system – a couple can divorce for any reason – fault does come into play in dividing up a couple's financial assets. From a legal perspective – and marriage is much more than that – marriage is a private contract between two individuals (need I say a man and a woman?) that imposes certain financial obligations, primarily on the husband, many of which are spelled out in the ketubah.

Upon dissolution of the marriage, the husband would pay a pre-agreed sum stipulated in the ketubah. This was a one-time payment and was thus often quite a substantial sum. Jewish law – quite brilliantly, I believe – allowed the couple to sever all ties upon divorce. The western system of monthly alimony can create unneeded tensions between people who may genuinely dislike one another, not to mention the potential of non-payment as time progresses. Even the issue of child support – which is beyond the scope of this column – was arranged in such a way so that the divorcing couple would have minimal contact.

Nonetheless, the wife could lose her claim to financial windfall of the ketubah if she were found to be at fault for the marriage ending. Such forfeiture would occur if she, for example, secretly fed her husband non-kosher food – eating it herself is not grounds for divorce – or if she refused to follow the laws of family purity. Interestingly, included in this list is cursing one's in-laws in the presence of one's spouse and conducting oneself in an immodest fashion, examples of which are spelled out in the Talmud.

It goes without saying that having an affair – and one must be faithful even to the extent of forfeiting one's life – would cause one to lose any financial support from one's ex-husband. These financial penalties are reciprocal, with the wife being able to demand a divorce if her husband is guilty of such moral wrongs. Thus, a woman can demand a divorce with full payment of her ketubah if her husband has had an affair.

Modern authorities point out that a number of the examples listed may not be operative today. As mentioned above, non-observance of the laws of family purity is grounds for divorce and the loss of ketubah rights. During talmudic times – and until the modern era – it was self-evident that a Jewish couple would observe this cornerstone of Jewish marriage. Unfortunately, this is no longer true. At times, we face a situation in which one spouse decides, often years into the marriage, that they will observe these laws. If, tragically, the couple can't solve this religious difference and divorce ensues, the observant party would be "at fault," and thus, if it's the woman who has become observant, she would be unable to collect her ketubah. While this newfound observance is most commendable, it may not come at the expense of the non-observant spouse.

Israel's water shortage

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last Saturday, on Shmini Atzeret, Jews around the world recited the beautiful Tefillat Geshem, the Prayer for Rain: "For blessing and not for curse. For life and not for death. For plenty and not for scarcity." [http://tinyurl.com/a8wr9]

Unfortunately, Israel and its neighbours have been suffering from a scarcity of rain for the past two years. And the general shortage of water has become one of the most contentious issues in the region. Today, as the rainy season begins, a look at Israel and the water shortage. [http://tinyurl.com/jskee]

After two years of below average precipitation, Lake Kinneret (the Sea of Galilee) is more than three metres below the "red line," the optimum water level of the lake. (It will continue to descend about a centimetre a day until the rains begin to fall.) Sinkholes have appeared on the shores of the Dead Sea, and a few years ago, there was talk of a ban on watering gardens in Israel. [http://tinyurl.com/ecnuo] Why has the situation been allowed to deteriorate so seriously? As reporter Herb Keinon says in a detailed and depressing article in the Jerusalem Post, there have been warnings for years but no one seemed to be listening. He quotes Haim Gvirtzman, a Hebrew University hydrologist: "No one cares. Everyone cares about politics, about peace, about making money. Who cares about things like health, the environment, or water?" [http://tinyurl.com/keavg]

Back in the 1950s, Levi Eshkol understood the role water would play in the country's future and was instrumental in the creation of the National Water Carrier. The future prime minister helped develop plans for a single network to link most of the regional water projects throughout the country. [http://tinyurl.com/hnfx8] The huge civil engineering project joined the Kinneret with Israel's other aquifers and is credited with pumping water and bringing life to the Negev and allowing portions of the desert to bloom, a dream of another prime minister, David Ben-Gurion. But with low rainfall and high demand, the water level of the Kinneret has been falling. [http://tinyurl.com/n5z8h]

The Kinneret isn't the only Israeli lake with problems. The Dead Sea, the lowest point on earth, is also experiencing a serious decline in sea level. Water diversion projects and industry on both the Israeli and Jordanian sides have reduced the Dead Sea to record lows. As the Jerusalem Post has put it, "The Dead Sea is dying of thirst." As the level drops – at the rate of one metre every year – Dead Sea resorts are finding themselves farther and farther from the water's edge. [http://tinyurl.com/jwgaq]

Despite the gravity of the issue, Ha'aretz's environmental reporter, Zafrir Rinat, says Israelis can be fickle about the country's water situation. All it takes is a couple of rainy winters and the crisis is forgotten. Rinat then points a finger at colleagues in the media and accuses them of letting the issue fade from the headlines. [http://tinyurl.com/ef2u2]

Israel's water crisis extends well beyond its own borders and could result in regional conflict, or worse. Ismail Serageldin, vice-president of the World Bank, said in 1995: "If the wars of this century were fought over oil, the wars of the next century will be fought over water – unless we change our approach to managing this precious and vital resource." [http://tinyurl.com/p7fvp]

Perhaps Serageldin's prediction wasn't so remarkable. Former prime minister Ariel Sharon once said: "People generally regard June 5, 1967 as the day the Six Day War began… That is the official date. But, in reality, it started 2½ years earlier, on the day Israel decided to act against the diversion of the Jordan." [http://tinyurl.com/et8aa]

Israel is regularly blamed by its neighbours for abusing its control of water resources. You can read some of the accusations [http://tinyurl.com/ jjgho] followed by a backgrounder by the pro-Israel group, CAMERA. [http://tinyurl.com/fm8wq]

Although the situation is extremely serious, there have been many suggestions about easing Israel's water shortage from desalination plants to conservation to seeding clouds. We'll look at some of those initiatives next time. Until then, you can keep your eye on Lake Kinneret's always changing water level. [http://tinyurl.com/ofcaa] Or take a peak at a live shot of the lake and check out what's doing on the shore of the city of Tiberias. [http://tinyurl.com/gqsg9]

Art, lecture project part of Autism Awareness Month

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Estée Klar-Wolfond, whose son Adam was diagnosed with autism at age 19 months in December 2003, is convinced that people's perceptions of autism can be a greater problem than autism itself.

Her Autism Acceptance Project (taaproject.com) ran a series of lectures earlier this month and is sponsoring an art exhibit at the Lonsdale Gallery in Toronto until Nov. 5. On Oct. 27, autistic musician and photographer Michael Moon will give a concert at the same gallery.

Last year, Klar-Wolfond, a former art curator, organized an exhibit by autistic American artist Jonathan Lerman, and she is planning another awareness project for next year.

Autistic people have different needs, Klar-Wolfond said in a telephone interview last week, in the middle of Canadian Autism Awareness Month. A difference in visual acuity may cause an autistic person to need to blink a lot, for example, or an autistic child may need to swing in a swing or pace for 20 minutes before being able to sit at a desk and learn.

"I can never fully understand that because I'm a non-autistic person," she said.

Klar-Wolfond said greater understanding of autism and more positive language with respect to the syndrome is needed.

Perhaps by understanding why some autistic children have precocious reading skills – Adam recognized letters and numbers by 12 months of age – we can help older non-readers benefit, she said.

Klar-Wolfond's quest to understand autism has included meetings with autistic people, some of whom spoke at this year's event. Contrary to what some people think, autistic people can be "very astute with respect to how others feel and how they [themselves] feel, despite the fact they might not be able to manifest it," she said.

Klar-Wolfond, 41, who said her husband Henry is her "silent partner" in her project, writes a blog called "The Joy of Autism." It wasn't her first choice of title – others she considered were already taken – but she liked the fact that it was "somewhat controversial" and "would really get people thinking."

Estée with Adam

From the time her son was diagnosed, Klar-Wolfond was "frustrated with the system," she said. "I saw a big injustice in how autistics were so stereotyped."

There has to be a balance between education, which is necessary, and understanding the autistic world, she said.

When her son met Michael Moon, the musician who is performing as part of this year's event, Moon – unlike some non-autistic adults – was very quiet and made no demands of Adam. Klar-Wolfond said every autistic child is different, but Adam needs teachers, occupational therapists and language therapists who have "a gentle affect."

Adam, who attends junior kindergarten at an "inclusive" preschool, is "a delightful little boy," his mother said. "He's happy and affectionate, intelligent. He likes to work on the computer."

One of the effects of his autism, however, is that he is "quasi-verbal," which can be a source of frustration for him. "He has a lot of struggles with that."

Autism is a challenge, but it can also be correlated with strengths, Klar-Wolfond contends. "[Autistic people] need to be included. They can be scientists, they can be educated, they can participate in some way, and we have to figure out how to enable that.

"Can you imagine how it affects the person who is autistic [when autism is viewed as a tragedy]?" she asked.

It is as important to give an autistic child a structured environment that accommodates his or her needs as it is to give a wheelchair to a physically disabled child or Braille materials to a blind child, she said. "This is a human rights issue."

I wish my family and friends a happy and healthy New Year.

Manufacturer sent 100,000 toys to Israel during war

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

This past summer, when Katyusha rockets were raining down on northern Israel and Qassam rockets were falling in the Negev, forcing families to huddle in shelters, Ronnen Harary decided to bring joy to Israeli children by giving them what all kids love and what he was in a perfect position to provide: toys.

Close to 100,000 of them, in fact.

Harary, the 35-year-old CEO and co-founder of Toronto-based Spin Master Ltd., one of North America's largest toy companies, said he felt an overwhelming desire to do whatever he could to help alleviate the stress being experienced by Israel's children, be they Jewish, Arab, Druze or Christian.

With that in mind, he sent priority e-mail to Toronto from Japan, where he was on business, and told his staff to ready an initial shipment of more than 5,000 Spin Master inflatable "Ready Beds" to be flown to Israel for immediate distribution.

"You always want to do what you can with what you have at your disposal," Harary said. "For me, this wasn't a pre-planned thing. It was a visceral reaction to what was going on [in Israel] and wanting to help as much as I could."

But there were problems with implementing the plan, the first being cost.

"When I got back to Toronto, I heard that these beds would cost about $100,000 to ship," he said.

The prohibitive expense threatened to stop his mission before it even got off the ground, so Harary decided to take a chance and "see if El Al would carry the freight for free. And it snowballed from there."

El Al normally doesn't ship cargo free of charge, but Stan Morais, general manager of El Al Canada, said that as soon as he heard about Harary's request, he dedicated himself to the cause.

"During times of conflict, we try to assist with heavily reduced shipping prices," Morais said. "But Spin Master's idea was unique, because it was for kids. We made some calls to our people in Israel, and it went all the way up to the board."

The airline's board of directors approved the plan, and El Al figures it provided Harary with nearly $250,000 worth of free cargo space and shipping by the end of the war.

All El Al asked in return was for Spin Master to consolidate its shipments in two locations for direct flights: New York and Amsterdam.

Harary and Odette Levy (Harary's mother and Spin Master's promotions manager) arranged for toys to be trucked from warehouses in Toronto and London to New York and Amsterdam, respectively.

By this point, Harary and Levy had themselves left for Israel to oversee the distribution and meet with families and children in affected areas.

Beyond shipping costs, Harary had to deal with other problems.

For one, he foresaw that Israeli customs officials might want to slap a duty on the toys.

In preparation, he pored over Israel's import regulations and discovered a clause stating that any shipments bound for Israel to help during wartime are exempt from duties. And in an unprecedented move, the Israeli government agreed to view the toys as necessary for the war effort, and it even went one step further, agreeing to a blanket exemption on taxes for all Spin Master shipments until the war ended.

On the ground in Israel, Harary and Levy also assembled a small army of volunteers to help in the cause, including government officials, mayors, civilians and companies.

"Kislev, a well-known Israeli brokerage house, cleared all our shipments into the country for free. But we also needed trucks, so we got the army and the police involved. The police were unbelievable. Beit sefer l'shotrim, a school for [police] officers, provided 800 people [to help distribute]," Levy said.

Everything seemed set to go.

But U.S. customs officials refused to allow the initial shipment of toys out of the United States, saying that Spin Master was an unrecognized vendor because it had never shipped from New York before.

Harary and Levy were beside themselves with worry that the mission might fall apart.

"Every day we woke up and thought 'How do we get the products into peoples' hands?' I'll never forget our first trip up to Haifa. We got in the car to see a couple of [bomb] shelters, and your heart just melts," Harary said.

In a fortuitous twist of fate, a Spin Master employee revealed that she had connections to former U.S. president Bill Clinton. He was contacted and told of the problems with U.S. customs. He agreed to make some calls. What's more, a friend of Harary's knew a U.S. senator, and another call was made. The senator immediately agreed to try to free up the shipment.

Less than 24 hours later, Harary received a call in Israel saying the shipment was being cleared to go.

To this day, neither Harary nor Levy know whether it was Clinton's intervention or the senator's that moved things along, but close to 100,000 toys and products were on their way to help Israeli children and their families.

It's an experience Harary said he'll never forget, and he urges others, particularly people his age, to consider mounting similar relief efforts.

"Hopefully, [this story] will inspire people to have the courage and will to take on their own personal, charitable endeavours," he said.

"In life, if you think about stuff too much, about all the obstacles, that doesn't give you the strength to deal with it. I [didn't do this] for any accolades, but for the Jewish community, this is an important story to hear," he added.

"When we went to the distribution centres and saw young people with their own cars, loading them up with food or medicine or toys to take to people who couldn't leave their villages, these young people, when bombs would fall, would go inside the shelter, wait for the sirens to finish and then go back up to their cars and drive around... To see these young people do this was just amazing."

Radio host helps make dreams come true

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It wasn't until David Cohen lost his job that he made his dream come true and began helping others do the same.

Cohen, 45, from North York, is the host of the Small Business, Big Ideas show, which broadcasts in the Durham Region on Sundays at 9 am on CKDO 1580 and 107.7 FM.

The show, which has just entered its fourth season, "is a talk-interview information show helping small business owners succeed. We'll talk about anything from financing to marketing to selling to personal development, to health and wellness. Anything that matters to small business, we'll talk about," Cohen said.

David Cohen

He said what propelled him to start this radio show was the loss of his job as a coach and facilitator at the Centennial College Centre for Entrepreneurship.

"My game plan for work was to start my own company, find something similar to what I was doing, and then live the dream doing a radio show."

Cohen launched his own company in 2002 called The Technicolour Umbrella, a coaching and consulting company for small business owners.

Once Cohen fulfilled the first part of his dream, he did whatever he could to convince radio programmers to put him on the air.

"I went to stations in Toronto and because I was unknown and had no experience, they turned me down. My neighbour, I recalled, worked in a radio station in Oshawa. I went to the program director and pitched the idea."

Cohen said that he was granted an hour-long slot, but the airtime would cost him $350 a show and the money would have to come out of his pocket unless he could lure companies to advertise on the show.

"I bought 13 weeks of airtime and I had to sell it in order to at least pay for the cost and make money out of it. I started calling every company that I thought would want to [advertise]. I called about 130 companies, and I got turned down 125 times," Cohen said.

"But I just kept going because I was really passionate about it and I really believed in the concept and that there was a need for this kind of radio programming. Here we are, four years later and it's doing really well."

He said that some of the notable guests have included Jack Canfield, author of the Chicken Soup for the Soul series, Stephen Covey, who wrote The 7 Habits of Highly Successful People and Ellie Kay, author of The Debt Diet, a book that was featured on The Oprah Winfrey Show.

The show also features local business owners, representatives from government agencies, as well as business coaches who offer advice and tips about how to succeed in running a small business.

"You can listen in, and get ideas and tools and tips you need to run your own business,' Cohen said.

"The feedback has been really positive. I'm always shocked. Listeners really enjoy the delivery of the show, the way it flows, they like the content. It's just good, smart radio," he said, adding that about 6,000 people tune in each week.

For those who feel that an hour a week isn't enough, the show now has its own website – www.smallbusinessbigideas.com – where listeners can read Cohen's blog, post comments or questions, or buy show tapes.

The show can also be heard online at www.ckdo.ca.

He said that although this is a business-oriented show, he doesn't shy away from inviting Jewish guests on the show and making reference to the fact that he himself is Jewish.

"I actually made comment in reference to my own religious background... I'm pretty open about that," he said.

"I made the claim that I think I've had the most guests from Temple Sinai [Congregation in Toronto] than any other show in Durham region. We're not afraid to share our own background and be proud of it. I'm not afraid to be who I am and to let my listeners get to know me a little bit."

He said the best part of the show for Cohen is being able to see his creativity in the marketplace and witnessing the growth and success of the show.

He said what excites him about small businesses is the newness of it and the thrill of being able to help someone achieve their own dream.

"When you see someone coming in, deadened from a job or a career that they existed in and now they have an opportunity to do something that they are really good at or passionate about, to see that come to fruition is really energizing," Cohen said.

Although he has already made his dream come true, Cohen still has the drive and the ambition to go further.

"I'd love to be on [Toronto AM radio station] CFRB one day and I'd love to see it go national, but I'm actively working on making this show the best it can be."

Dentist-cum-artist subject of TV documentary

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Will be aired November 1

Harry Rosen was good with tools and wanted to be an engineer, but when he graduated from Baron Byng High School in 1946, the prospects did not seem good for Jews in engineering.

So, like many other sons of Jewish immigrants (his parents were from Latvia), he enrolled in dental school at McGill University. He specialized in prosthodontics, or reconstructive dentistry, which allowed him to use his talent for making things and problem-solving.

He became a pioneering professor of prosthodontics at his alma mater, and was a mentor to generations of students over the decades.

But he was not content to work in the micro-environment of the mouth only. After he and wife, Delores, bought a country home in the Laurentians, he noticed that the bottom of the lake and the surrounding landscape were strewn with countless boulders that just cried out to be put to some practical use.

Over the past 40-odd years since then, Rosen has retrieved, split and repositioned an estimated 1,000 tons of rock by hand, using winches, pulleys and levers he has devised, the innate engineer finding expression.

After making every functional thing he could think of with these rocks, including terraces, walls, drainage systems, even an amphitheatre, in the past eight years he has given his artistic side free reign.

He has applied the minute precision and innovation that he developed as a restorative dentist to the monumental.

His masterwork is a 12-foot, 8-ton, curvaceous female form, a cross between a mermaid and Cleopatra, called Universal Woman on a Half Shell, that dominates his Ste. Marguerite cottage grounds. Completed in 2003, it is composed of 600 rocks split and stacked from toe to head, and so solidly fitted together he jokes that even a bomb won't bring down this lady.

Considering his ability to marry science and art, an upcoming PBS Mountain Lake television documentary is appropriately titled Dr. Harry Rosen: Renaissance Man. Just to round out the picture, Rosen is also an equestrian and has taught horses to jump, using techniques that succeeded with his dental students, he says.

Coinciding with the documentary's release is the creation of a fund in Rosen's name at the McGill dental faculty by friends and admirers, led by former Montrealers Bluma and Bram Appel of Toronto. The documentary will be aired on PBS Mountain Lake Nov. 1 as part of the Art Express series at 8 p.m., which is accessible to Bell ExpressVu subscribers in the Toronto area.

The half-hour film, narrated by Robert Adams, traces Rosen's life and professional and artistic development. After 53 years, he still maintains a full dental practice and, as a professor emeritus, continues to teach dental residents.

And, at 77, he's also still playing with rocks, heaving 100-pounders without a second thought. His current work-in-progress is Little Hercules, a boy hoisting a barbell, dedicated to his grandson.

Rosen says he loves the textures, colours and shapes of stone and got "turned on by the challenge of moving these massive things and creating something that was more beautiful than it was before."

He was spurred on to explore the artistic possibilities of stonework when he and Delores spotted the Inuit inukshuk erected outside the downtown McCord Museum in 1998. He marvelled at how all those stones were held together by gravity alone.

"I was inspired by the native art, but I wanted to do something, let's say, more sophisticated," he said.

Rosen sees connection between art and profession

His first stone sculpture was his own inukshuk, 400 stones weighing 10 tons and rising nine feet. The head is a single one-ton volcanic stone.

He began Universal Woman in 2000 and it took him three years to finish it, working on weekends and holidays.

With only chisel and mallet, Rosen split about 600 stones into flat stackable surfaces two to four inches thick. The only electric tool he used was a diamond-disc grinder to smooth edges. The sculpture has a fully formed face and page-boy hairdo.

As a dentist, Rosen was known as the guy "who took on the tough nuts nobody else could crack," so transforming a pile of rocks into a sinuous siren was just one more challenge. To make things a little harder, he insisted on giving her arms that stretch out horizontally. He put her in a four-ton half-shell because he was inspired by Botticelli's painting The Birth of Venus.

Rosen sees a strong correlation between his "earth art" and what he does for a living. "In reconstructive dentistry you start with almost nothing, just the roots of the teeth, and build a structure on that which is functional and looks good. I'm adapting that to another scale."

Rosen is still a strapping, imposing figure. "It keeps you in shape. You can work at this all day and not get bored. No gym can give you that kind of motivation," he said.

Rosen asked that income from the fund in his name be used to encourage young dentists to teach, something that is becoming harder to do. "It's different today. Teaching does not really pay, and it costs so much now to set up a practice. I was raised in a different age when it was a great honour to be a teacher."

The fund, which will be administered by the McGill dean of dentistry, will pay for "little perks" like enabling recipients to take a course out of town or buy a computer, he said.

Retirement homes open their doors

Three Jewish retirement residences in Toronto — Pine Villa, Forest Hill Place and Terrace Gardens — will open their doors to the community on Oct. 22, from 1 to 4 p.m., for fundraising events in support of the Heart and Stroke Foundation. The fundraisers coincide with the Annual Open Doors Program.

In its second year, Open Doors provides an opportunity for retirement residences and long-term care homes to open their doors to seniors and their families who are interested in seniors' housing options and would like to take a tour of the sites, or having their questions about the transition from one's home to retirement housing answered.

Pine Villa Retirement Residence, 1035 Eglinton Ave. W., hosts an afternoon of jazz music. Refreshments include delicious crepes, chocolate fondue, biscotti and coffee. The York Jazz Ensemble's trio will perform modern and swing music throughout the afternoon. Visitors can purchase Jewish calendars and homemade biscotti, with proceeds going to the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

At Forest Hill Place, 645 Castlefield Ave., a harvest fair will be held. Festivities will include line dancing, and refreshments such as delectable apple pie will be available. A harvest bake sale will be put on by the residents of Forest Hill Place, with proceeds from the sale going to the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

Terrace Gardens Retirement Residence, 3705 Bathurst St., hosts a Kosher Food Fest. Guests can sample the treats from numerous kosher food vendors who will have displays at the residence. Proceeds from a draw go to the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

Free shuttle service to the three events, with pickup at the Bialik Hebrew Day School at 2670 Bathurst St. at 12:30 p.m. and 1:45 p.m., is available.

Clashes among Palestinians get scant attention

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last month, when Hamas and Fatah were talking about forming a unity government, mainstream media gave the story front-page coverage. But when Hamas backed out of the deal, refusing to abandon its ideological commitment to destroy Israel, major papers relegated the story to the inside pages. The Globe and Mail, for instance, placed "Palestinian leaders clash over Israel" by Carolynne Wheeler (Sept. 23) on page 16. The Sept. 23 National Post also ran the story inside, but its headline, "Palestinian PM rejects Abbas' recognition of Israel," was a more direct depiction of the facts.

In the Globe, Wheeler accurately led with Hamas's rejectionism: "Assurances given by Palestinian Authority president Mahmoud Abbas that his [proposed] new national unity government would recognize Israel and all previous peace deals have been dismissed by his prime minister [Ismail Haniyeh], who swore never to lead such a government."

Wheeler wrote that, at most, Hamas is prepared for "a long-term truce in exchange for a Palestinian state based on pre-1967 borders."

What Hamas will not do is comply with the demands of the international community, as expressed by the socalled "Quartet" (the European Union, Russia, the United States and United Nations), that it explicitly recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Were Hamas to meet these conditions, international financial aid to the Palestinian Authority would resume at once, and the door might be open to Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

What the West needs to understand, however, is that Hamas consists of "true believers" – in this case Islamic extremists who cannot renounce their deeply held belief that forbids Jewish sovereignty on "Islamic soil."

So while Hamas clearly wants financial aid to relieve the growing desperation of the Palestinians, it will not accept the legitimacy of Israel's existence as a Jewish state in order to secure that aid. Nor, apparently, will it compromise its principles to sit with Fatah in a national unity government.

Some analysts, however, still hold out hope that Hamas will modify its stand to reach some accommodation with Israel. What they fail to realize is that were Hamas to do so, it would no longer be the same organization as currently defined by its rejectionist – and racist – charter.

In the meantime, as Wheeler wrote, the West Bank and Gaza are "falling deeper into poverty and violence, with teachers, medical workers and security forces staging demonstrations after largely going unpaid since March." And, she noted, "Gaza is already falling into clan warfare."

Since Wheeler filed that piece, the unity talks have collapsed and violence has grown, with many Palestinians wounded and even killed in clashes between Hamas and Fatah supporters. But these developments received very scant attention.

For example, only in a "World in Brief" Reuters bulletin ("Hamas talks dead, Abbas asserts," Oct. 5) did the Globe report that during a visit by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Abbas formally announced the end of unity talks and that he might dissolve the Hamas-led government and call for new elections for the Palestinian Legislative Council.

On Oct. 6, the paper reported on mounting internecine violence merely in a 50-word "World in Brief" AFP wire story, "Hamas, Fatah target each other in Gaza."

On these days, the National Post didn't treat either story at all.

To some degree, this lack of attention can be attributed to the fact that substantial media attention had turned during this period to the North Korean nuclear threat.

Still, what does such relative inattention to important negative developments within Palestinian society say about some mainstream news attitudes towards intra-Arab affairs in general?

* * *

In "Unity as a Lifesaver," (Ha'aretz, Oct. 3), Danny Rubinstein wrote: "Shin Bet security service head Yuval Diskin informed the government at its last meeting that the border between Gaza and Egypt is largely porous and that considerable quantities of explosives and weapons are being smuggled into Gaza. In such a situation, sooner or later there will be Katyushas in Gaza, and in the future perhaps in the West Bank as well."

Clearly the media need to keep an eye on Egypt's failure – or refusal – to stop the cross-border smuggling, and also on allegations that Iran and Syria, the backers of Hezbollah and other terrorist groups, are behind these operations.

In Exile or at Home?

Reflections on the Jews, Israel and Anti-Semitism in an Uncertain World

Even after enduring and surviving several millennia, even at a time of statehood and prosperity, Israel and World Jewry struggle for a place among the nations in an unbalanced and precarious world. What will be now as genocidal Islamism is on the march? Does the West care and how will it respond? Four leading observers will reflect on these unavoidable questions.

Winnipeg Jewish Theatre's future in doubt

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT), which bills itself as Canada's only professional Jewish theatre company, is threatening to close its doors after this season unless attendance picks up considerably.

The non-profit theatre's board of directors put its cards on the table in an open letter to the community in the Sept 20 edition of Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News.

"Our subscription base of 330 [30 pr cent of seating capacity] is just not good enough," said WJT president David Marr, noting that in 2001, the company had 800 season-ticket subscribers.

"We need to boost our number of season ticket holders to at least 750 if the theatre is to remain viable."

The WJT was founded in 1987 by music teacher and theatre enthusiast Bev Aronovitch. Its mandate is to mount productions written by modern Jewish playwrights and/or containing Jewish characters and themes.

The theatre generally puts on three shows a year including at least one commissioned work each season. This season's entries include Golda's Balcony, based on the life of Golda Meir; Soap and Laughter (the commissioned play) by local actor and playwright Chris Sigurdson; and Arthur Miller's Broken Glass.

With a declining audience comes declining revenues, Marr noted. The theatre receives one-third of its funding from the three levels of government, and it has an endowment fund of $650,000, established in 1992, that Marr describes as a testament to the community's support for the theatre.

But the WJT depends on fundraising and ticket sales for the bulk of its revenues.

Marr said an emergency fundraising campaign in the spring raised $50,000 to pay down a debt and help pay expenses for this season. He notes that the board is trying to raise an additional $50,000 plus $14,000 more in corporate sponsorships to pay for continuing operating expenses.

The theatre's budget for this year is $312,000, with a forecast deficit of $4,000.

He said the public response to the open letter in the paper has been encouraging but that ticket sales for this year are still not at the level the board would like to see.

"The bottom line is that we can't continue to put on plays if we don't have audience support," he said.

Green Party activist starts Jewish ecology group

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Alon Weinberg has a passion for Judaism, spirituality and ecology. The Winnipeg Green Party activist founded the Jewish ecology group Adamah'Nitoba this summer, which enables him to combine his passions in a common cause.

"The purpose is to take Jewish tradition and show how it is connected to the world at large," Weinberg says. "We have been disconnected from the land by centuries of wandering and an inability [for the most part] to own land. Many of our traditions don't make a lot of sense unless they are seen in a holistic context."

Weinberg began contemplating the need for an organization like Adamah'Nitoba three years ago while he was working at the Teva Learning Center in New York, teaching Jewish kids about the environment and leading environmental camping sessions.

"I came back to Winnipeg in the spring of 2004 for my zaide's funeral," Weinberg says. "Then I went back east to attend the COEJL [Coalition on the Environment in Jewish Life] annual conference [in Boston that year].

"I was sitting with about a dozen other Canadian delegates and we began discussing the need for a Canadian network. There are Jewish ecology groups in Vancouver [Adam and Adamah] and Toronto [Torat Hatevah]. I figured there can't be a network without a group in Winnipeg."

Weinberg applied for and received a startup grant for Adamah'Nitoba from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. Thus far, he has held two introductory programs – a picnic in August that attracted about 20 people and a study evening on the Shabbat evening before Yom Kippur intended to get people thinking about ecological tshuvah. He is also putting out a newsletter with a mailing list of between 75 and 100 and an e-mail newsletter, which goes out to about 150 readers, including some outside of Winnipeg.

"We have received positive feedback from the director of the Teva Learning Center," he says.

Weinberg's plans for future programs include an interfaith gathering some time in November, with the objective of "promoting a sacred balance" through trying to get religious institutions to become more energy efficient. He is also planning a Shabbaton in the spring and perhaps a weekend retreat in the countryside somewhere and hopes to bring to Winnipeg environmental activists Noam Dolgin from Vancouver and Rabbis Arthur Waskow and Phyllis Berman to lead the Shabbaton or retreat.

"I would really like to attract more university students," Weinberg says. "Younger people may want to be become more involved in Judaism in a more meaningful way."

Gray Academy teachers win prestigious awards

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Gray Academy of Jewish Education is celebrating three of its teachers who have won prestigious awards.

On Sept. 29, Gray Academy high school biology teacher Sheppy Coodin received the BIOTECanada Biogen Idec Teaching Excellence Award, Canada's top national biotechnology teaching prize – and the $5,000 cheque that goes along with it – for his efforts to turn high school students on to biotechnology.

Coodin, originally from Winnipeg, earned a PhD in cell biology and his teaching degree at the University of Western Ontario in London.

Before joining the Gray Academy staff three years ago, he taught high school science and biology at St. John's-Ravenscourt, Manitoba's most prestigious private school, for eight years.

"I became interested in biotechnology after I began teaching, Coodin says. "I wanted to share my excitement about this new field with my students. It was clear to me – and Biotec-Canada – that if Canadian youth were going to pursue careers in biotechnology, then it had to be put on their radar screens in high school."

To that end, in 1999, Coodin launched Biotrek, a weeklong summer program for high school students. For the first four years, Coodin only offered the program in Winnipeg. A grant from Monsanto in 2003 allowed him to offer it in other cities in Canada.

This past summer, Biotrek was available in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Oakville, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Steinbach, Man. (Coodin hires a teacher to teach Biotrek in Vancouver and another teacher for the program in eastern Canada.)

Each lab, he notes, costs $30,000 to mount, with equipment and materials donated by private Canadian biotech companies.

The Biotrek program has room for only 16 students in each city, Coodin says. "This past summer in Vancouver, 75 students applied for the course. We added two extra sessions in Vancouver to accommodate as many students as we could."

Coodin says that he gets quite a lot of positive feedback. He cites a letter from one Biotrek grad in Vancouver who is now studying biotechnology in a highly specialized program at the University of British Columbia who decided on a biotechnology career because of Biotrek.

In November, Gray Academy teachers Rochelle Gamliel and Joyce Kerr are going to an international conference of Jewish educators and community leaders in Los Angeles to receive Grinspoon-Steinhardt Awards for Excellence in Jewish Education. The awards recognizes classroom teachers across North America who demonstrate exceptional achievement in Jewish education.

"It feels good to be recognized in this manner," says Kerr, who is a vice-principal and teaches Grade 1 Judaic studies. "But I see this as also an honour for the school and the community."

Gamliel, who teaches Grade 12 Holocaust studies and a Grade 7 course in family roots, says: "Accolades such as this are very heartwarming. You teach though because you love what you're doing, not because you expect any recognition."

Sheppy Coodin

Gamliel is the senior of the two teachers. She has been teaching in the Winnipeg Jewish school system for 25 years after having lived in Israel for 11 years. For most of her career, she taught elementary school. She has been teaching in the high school since 1997 and has been teaching the Holocaust program since 2002.

"I have taken courses in Holocaust studies for educators, and I participated in a hands-on two-week summer program for educators in Poland and Lithuania," she says.

In Gamliel's family roots program, students do 50-page reports on their families. "They study their parents, grandparents, how they ended up in Winnipeg instead of Florida," she says. "Some can only go back as far as the Holocaust, because everything has been lost. Some go back to the 1800s."

Gamliel praises Kerr for helping to create the Judaic spirit that pervades the school and makes it a comfortable place for students to learn. Kerr is originally from Calgary, where she began her teaching career in the Jewish school in which she grew up.

Israel Emergency Campaign

Counting the Toll

When the fighting between Israel and Hezbollah terrorists ended two months ago, the battle began for northern Israel residents to rebuild their lives. The damage to Israel's north was unprecedented. Close to one-third of Israel's population had been traumatized. Some 90,000 small businesses faced extinction. Physical damage was estimated to be at least $1 billion. Today, the people of the north are still suffering. Families face shocking property damage. Tens of thousands of children and adults jump at every loud noise and some youngsters are even afraid to sleep in their own beds.

UJA Federation's Impact

Our community was North America's first to launch an Israel Emergency Campaign and our community's funds were the first to arrive in northern Israel when the war began. Through your generosity, we moved children away from the war zone to summer camps in safer areas of the country; offered thousands of families a week of respite away from the rockets; and provided emergency supplies of food and medicine.

Karnit's Story

During the war, Karnit Malka from Kiryat Shmona – the mother of an eight year old and five year old triplets - and her husband - experienced a nightmare. On their way home from a short respite in Eilat , a neighbour called with the horrifying news: their home had suffered a direct hit. . "When I walked in, I couldn't breathe," she explains. "Realizing that the kids could have been in the house was terrifying. There's no word to describe the stress and feeling of helplessness."

It wasn't easy for the children to witness the destruction either. They turned to their parents to ask: "Why did it happen to us? Did we do something wrong? Why do they hate us so much?"

Nonetheless, Karnit is adamant that she and her family will never leave Kiryat Shmona, where she was born and raised. And her children, she insists, feel the same way.

2007 Community Briefing

Crucial Assistance

Since the war ended, UJA Federation has sent millions to northern Israel to restore essential services for the vulnerable, and to provide thousands with trauma counseling, vocational training and temporary housing.

Urgent Needs

The needs of the north are still critical. UJA Federation is proud to be part of a $387 million recovery operation led by the Jewish Agency for Israel with financial support from North American Jewish Federations. Here's what we're doing together:

- Helping 110,000 children who experienced rocket attacks
- Purchasing school supplies for traumatized children
- Counseling new immigrants whose first few weeks in Israel were spent inside bomb shelters
- Reinvigorating the Jewish Agency Fund for Victims of Terror
- Providing scholarships for northern Israel college students who could not earn enough for tuition during the summer
- Offering emergency loans for struggling small businesses
- Re-equipping hospitals and other crucial community facilities
- Initiating a new program to encourage northern families to remain and others to move to the area

The message from Israel to its enemies is clear. We are here to stay and we are growing stronger.

Ignatieff refuses to retract war crime assertion

Ignatieff "rightly has acknowledged his earlier mistake when he said he was 'not losing sleep' over what happened in Qana. What happened in Qana was indeed a tragedy, but it was not a war crime." Twenty-eight civilians, mostly women and children, were confirmed to have been killed.

Rae initially said Ignatieff was mistaken, while fellow leadership candidate Joe Volpe attempted to distance Ignatieff's views from Liberal party policy. "In law, a crime usually requires intent. Surely, Mr. Ignatieff is not suggesting that Israel, while fighting a defensive war, was acting with the intention of harming civilians. He should retract his inaccurate and harmful remarks without delay."

Ignatieff did not retract his assertion that Israel's attack on Qana was a war crime and that he should have said so at the time.

"I was a professor of human rights. I am also a professor of rights in war. What happened in Qana was a war crime. I should have said that. That's clear," he said on the Quebec program, referring to a remark he made last summer that he would not "lose any sleep" over the loss of civilian life as a result of Israel's bombing of Qana during its war with Hezbollah.

At a press conference in Toronto Oct. 11, Ignatieff – who, before entering politics in last January's election, was director of the Carr Centre for Human Rights Policy at Harvard University – added that Israeli civilians had also been the victims of war crimes committed by Hezbollah. He described himself as a friend of Israel, commenting that "a true friend says what he thinks."

On his campaign website, Ignatieff said, "Qana was a terrible human tragedy where innocent civilians died in a conflict that saw unjustified tragedies on all sides. For this reason, I have always been a vocal supporter for a peaceful solution to tensions in the Middle East. There are no further military solutions in this region."

At the same time, he affirmed that he strongly supported Israel's right to "respond to Hezbollah's provocation and to send the terrorist militia a very clear message that kidnapping soldiers and firing rockets on Israel will never be tolerated… This summer, Hezbollah tried to lure Israel into a regional conflict to cause Israel to lose its remaining international support. It did not succeed."

The only long-term solution is a two-state one, with an "independent" Lebanon, he continued, adding that a Palestinian state and Lebanon must recognize Israel's right to exist in peace.

Ignatieff portrayed himself as "a lifelong friend" of Israel, noting that he has lived and taught there (he was a fellow at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1999).

"If my friendship on occasion involves criticism, it is because this is the truest form of friendship."

Ignatieff has also said he will be travelling to Israel next month for a three-day fact-finding tour for members of Parliament organized by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

Ignatieff's explanation did not satisfy Israel's Ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker. He told The CJN that Ignatieff must know, as a former professor of human rights and international affairs, that the air strike on Qana does not qualify as a war crime "from either the point of view of law or the point of view of fact." But Baker stopped short of accusing him of being disingenuous.

Baker, who was a legal adviser to Israel's foreign ministry and helped draw up the definition of a war crime under international law, said Israel did not wilfully target civilians and that it was "well known" that Hezbollah kept missiles in the vicinity of Qana and even in private homes. Moreover, he said Israel warned civilians of the impending air strike by distributing leaflets and by broadcast.

"We did everything that is required under international law," he said.

"It's not for me to say in the middle of a leadership campaign whether he was being disingenuous… but I do find it surprising for a professor of his experience to make such a mistake."

Baker added that it can't be ignored that Ignatieff chose to make the remark in Quebec, where support for Israel's battle with Hezbollah was weaker.

Baker said he had not communicated directly with Ignatieff, but hoped to do so.

The CIC and B'nai Brith Canada were also not persuaded by Ignatieff's response.

In a letter to Ignatieff, the CIC expressed "profound concern" about the war crime remark, especially because it was "anchored in your expertise in the area of international law and the conduct of war." CIC national chair Marc Gold asked Ignatieff for a "clarification – in both official languages – that clearly sets out your view of the issue and unambiguously rejects the suggestion that Israel is guilty of any such conduct."

Alicia Richler, the CIC's associate communications director, told The CJN that Ignatieff's "wishy-washy answer" is not what the CIC was looking for, but it is not making any further comment. The CIC, she also said, is "not wading into the wars going on in the government" as a result of Harper's allegation that the leadership contenders are anti-Israel because it is "non-partisan" and wishes to work with all parties.

B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant urged interim Liberal leader Bill Graham to "disassociate" the party from Ignatieff's remarks and for the other leadership candidates to publicly denounce his "false accusations" against Israel.

SUKKOS IN THE CITY

More than 600 people attended Chabad Lubavitch of Markham's annual Sukkos in the City event and the dedication of the new Rabbi Levi Bialo Youth Wing on Oct. 9. A Sukkot party featuring carnival rides, a barbecue, vendors, a live circus and other events for the kids was followed by the opening ceremony for the new youth wing named in memory of the young adult director at Chabad of Markham who was tragically killed in a train crash on Green Lane a little over a year ago. The 2,500-square-foot expansion will be used for the Torah Tots Preschool and the Chabad youth programs. The new space is being built through a generous grant from York Region and donations from the community. The family of the late Rabbi Bialo cut the ceremonial ribbon, and then the crowd was invited to browse around the new facility and gather for refreshments in the sukkah. Seen, from left, are Rabbi Bialo's siblings Menachem, Yossi and Sarah Bialo; Rebbitzen Goldie Plotkin; Rabbi Bialo's wife, Shira Bialo, his mother, Gitty Bialo, and sibling Kivi Bialo; Rabbi Avraham Plotkin; and Chabad Lubavitch of Markham president Richard Steyn.

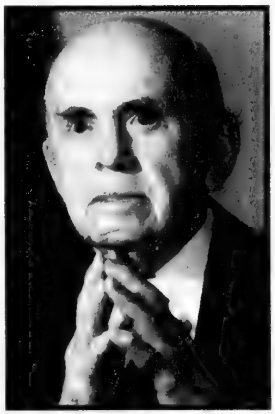
Grocer built IGA chain

Helped many causes locally and in Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Bertram Loeb, a visionary businessman, philanthropist and committed Zionist, died in Ottawa on Sept. 11 at age 90.

The second-eldest of six sons of the late Moses and Rose Loeb, Russian immigrants who arrived in Ottawa in 1912, Loeb took over and greatly expanded his family's small wholesale grocery business after serving in World War II.



Bertram Loeb
[The Ottawa Citizen photo]

Following Loeb's early education in Ottawa, he earned a BA from New York University, a bachelor's degree in Hebrew literature from the Jewish Theological Seminary and a master's degree in Hebrew literature and philosophy from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in what was then Palestine.

At one time, Loeb considered becoming a rabbi.

His daughter, Naomi Loeb, said, "My grandfather was very religious and wanted one of his six sons to become a rabbi and my father seemed the most likely, [but] the pull of business was greater than the pull of the life of clergy."

Once he joined the family business, Loeb set his sites on expansion. He amassed a large fortune by purchasing the first Independent Grocers Alliance (IGA) grocery store franchise in Canada and expanding the concept across Canada and the United States in the 1950s and 1960s. Loeb Canada Inc. is now owned by Montreal-based grocery store giant Metro Inc.

On a State of Israel Bond mission in the early 1950s, Loeb met David Ben-Gurion who, Naomi Loeb said, encouraged him to come to Israel to work.

When told that Loeb was in the grocery business in Canada, Ben-Gurion asked him to open similar stores in Israel.

"That sort of challenge was all my father needed," said Naomi Loeb.

He was instrumental in the establishment of Israel's first Supersol store, which opened in 1958 and grew into the country's first chain of modern supermarkets. "The governments of Iran and Russia contacted my father subsequently to open supermarkets there, but Israel was my father's main interest and focus."

The well-known philanthropist donated vast amounts of money to a variety of causes, both locally and in Israel. He believed strongly in the importance of contributing to society, and carefully considered each and every donation, his daughter said.

In Ottawa, the Loeb family name can be seen on the Loeb Building at Carleton University; on the Loeb Health Research Institute, which merged with the Ottawa Hospital Research Institute to form the Ottawa Health Research Institute in 2001; and the Bertram Loeb Organ-Tissue Donation Institute.

"Bert Loeb was a thinking person," he said. "He did not merely give charity. He wanted to make sure that his money generated a significant change for the better. His last major gift, to set up the Bertram Loeb Organ-Tissue Donation Institute, has already made Ottawa No. 1 in Ontario for cornea retrieval and has led to the establishment of the first chair anywhere in the world in organ donation, at the University of Ottawa."

In addition to his money, Loeb gave generously of his time, energy and considerable abilities to a variety of causes. He served as president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa and chaired the United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa campaign, the UJA Emergency Campaign and Ottawa State of Israel Bonds.

Nationally, he served as first vice-president of the Zionist Organization of Canada, on the executive committee of the Canada-Israel Development Corporation and as national chairman of the United Israel Appeal.

Loeb also served as operations chairman of the National Arts Centre; chairman of the 1968 United Appeal of Ottawa; as a governor of Carleton University; as a director of the Ottawa Philharmonic Orchestra; and as chairman of the Ottawa Civic Hospital Development Campaign.

"My father was a very complicated person, an anomaly in the business world," said Naomi Loeb. "He had a very deep spiritual side. He also loved music and his family. He had an enormous influence on us, in the family. He was a complex, dynamic person, and we are really going to miss him."

In addition to his daughter Naomi, Loeb is survived by daughter Diane, grandson Samuel, and brothers Jules and David.

Book offers survival tips for college bound

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Yadin Kaufmann's son was getting ready to apply to university, there were things he wanted his son to know about the student experience.

Yadin Kaufmann

"I thought, 'How do I convey to him what college is all about?' This is obviously something he hadn't done before and to make his entry as smooth as possible, it would be good to give him some advice," said Kaufmann, the co-founder of Atlanta-based Hundreds of Heads books, and one of the editors of its series of survival guides for everyday life.

"Well, I can tell him my own college experience, but first of all, I'm his father, so, is he really going to listen or think that it's relevant? And second of all, I consider myself young and hip, but... things have changed," he added.

Out of this train of thought came the idea to interview hundreds of people who have been through some of life's challenges and write books based on their opinions and advice.

Three years ago, Kaufmann got in touch with an old college buddy, Mark Bernstein, a former senior vice-president of CNN.com, and they have since developed 12 survival guides that range in topics from getting into college to getting married to having a baby.

"Each title is aimed at helping people get through life's major challenges or milestones, with the help of people who have been there before and have something interesting to say about it," said Kaufmann, a Harvard Law School graduate who also has journalism experience as a former editor of the Harvard Law Review.

Their latest title, How to Survive Getting into College, offers high school students advice from college students who have already been through the same process.

Kaufmann said the information was compiled by journalists – he calls them "headhunters" – who travelled all over North America to find students willing to share their stories about how they applied to universities, what made them stand out, how they handled the interview process, and more.

"We went around and interviewed students at well over 100 different colleges – mostly in the United States, but we have a few from Canada also, such as York University, McGill University and Queen's University."

He said that in addition to students' advice, the book's editor, Rachel Korn – a former admissions officer at Wellesley College, the University of Pennsylvania and Brandeis University – was able to provide her own expertise about what admissions departments look for in applications, and in students.

How to Survive Your Freshman Year was the first title in the 12-book series, and a second edition was released earlier this year that offers crucial tips for all students living away from home for the first time.

"[The book] helps entering freshmen with insights about what to take with them when they go to school, where to choose to live when they get to campus, campus food, how to deal with roommates, picking a major, how to prepare for exams, and the social aspects as well," Kaufmann said.

One student featured in the book said, "Do not download AOL Instant Messenger. That will be the end of you. That is the greatest procrastination tool known to man. I wish I had never discovered that stupid thing."

Book relies on advice from students

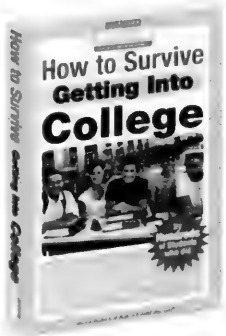
"I would read in my bed and I would, obviously, fall asleep. When you're in your bed, that's what you do. And then you start to associate reading with sleeping, so anytime you try to read anywhere, you fall asleep. So, don't read in your bed."

A warning about gaining weight in first year – known as the "Freshman 15" – came from another student who learned the hard way.



"Just because you can take as much as you want in a dining hall does not mean you should," she warned.

Obtaining advice from students rather than professionals is what sets these books apart from other guides, Kaufmann said.

"It's peer-to-peer content. It's not some adult preaching. It's not some adult who's got some theory about how college students should behave or what they should do," he said.

"Our headhunters found everyday students and that is part of the philosophy behind the series. We don't go looking for so-called experts on a subject. There are enough books like that that have the philosophy of someone who is supposed to be an expert. We believe that the more everyday people you hear from, the more you'll find someone who has experiences more similar to your own," Kaufmann said, adding that he's always interested in hearing from people who want to share their stories.

Student journalists to gather at GA

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Forty university students across North America will be given the opportunity to hone their reporting skills by participating in the 17th annual Do the Write Thing program at the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities (GA), which is being held in Los Angeles next month.

Do the Write Thing (DTWT) is a four-day conference that offers workshops conducted by professionals associated with Jewish and Israeli newspapers and magazines.

Tuca Bihari, the Canadian director of the University Student Division of Hagshama, said that the conference, which runs from Nov. 12 to 15 alongside the GA, allows students interested in journalism to interact with, and learn from, influential Jewish community leaders.

"They will also have a chance to interact with editors of Jewish and Israeli newspapers. Last year, we had the editor of Jpost, the editor of Ha'aretz online and also editors from the main local newspapers in the Jewish community here in Toronto," he said, adding that professionals of the same caliber are expected to share their expertise at this year's DTWT.

He said that although they don't have a final list of speakers yet, two that are confirmed are Gary Rosenblatt, the editor of New York's Jewish Week and Rob Eshman, the editor of LA's Jewish Journal. He also expects representatives from the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz, two major Israeli newspapers.

"We work together with the GA. Whoever is coming to the GA, we will try to bring to our conference," Bihari said.

The $120 registration fee for the program includes all hotel expenses, most meals, workshops and sessions, as well as registration for the GA.

Travel scholarships are available for those who publish articles on the conference in any campus, community or general newspapers, but the deadline to apply is tomorrow, Oct. 20.

The workshops and sessions will teach potential journalists about objective reporting, while focusing on ways to improve Israel's image on campus and in the media.

Topics will include Israel's response to terrorism, the media's influence in foreign policy-making, Israel's domestic politics and foreign relations, and Zionism on campus.

Bihari said that the best part of registering for DTWT is that participants will receive "journalist status" for the rest of the GA sessions.

"That means they'll receive a press pass to be able to go to all the meetings as part of the press and even try to talk with the politicians or other special guests they'll have at the GA," he said, adding that organizers of the GA are expecting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the leader of the opposition Binyamin Netanyahu, as well as other notable Israeli cabinet ministers.

Do the Write Thing is brought to you by the World Zionist Organization – Department for Zionist Activities, The World Zionist Organization – Hagshama Department, The Jewish Agency for Israel-Spokesperson's Office and The American Zionist Movement.

She taught for a year in Calgary before moving to Winnipeg with her husband in 1988.

Kerr started working at Gray Academy as a kindergarten teacher. She has taught Grade 1 for most of her time at the school. She also served as Judaic studies co-ordinator from 1997 to 2000, and is currently a half-time vice-principal.

"I have always loved working with kids, especially younger children," she says.

There were only three other Canadian Grinspoon-Steinhardt honorees this year Miriam Araf from Montreal, Rabbi Shmuel Dov Yarmush from Ottawa and Eleanor Braude from Vancouver. Gray Academy vice-principal Lori Binder was a previous honoree.

Pears can be used in savoury or sweet dishes

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Next to the apple, the best known and used fall fruit is the pear. There are more than 3,000 known pear varieties grown around the world.

One reason I love pears is that they are incredibly versatile. In addition to being delicious served raw, they can be baked, poached, sautéed, roasted or grilled in both sweet and savoury dishes. In fact, pretty much anything you can make with an apple you can make with a pear.

PEAR AND PECAN SALAD

3 tbsp. apple cider vinegar
4 tsp. Dijon mustard
4 tbsp. honey
¼ cup oil
1 tsp. poppy seeds
mixed lettuce
½ cup pecans toasted and chopped
2 pears peeled and cut in pieces

In a small bowl combine the vinegar, mustard, and honey. Mix to combine. Gradually whisk in the oil and then mix in poppy seeds. Season the dressing to taste with salt and pepper and set it aside. In a salad bowl, combine the lettuce, pears and pecans. Pour in enough dressing to coat and toss. Season once again with salt and pepper. Divide salad among 8 plates and serve with the remaining dressing. Serves 2 to 4.

GREEK PEAR SALAD

Greek vinaigrette:
¼ cup olive oil or vegetable oil
3 to 4 tbsp. white wine vinegar
2 tsp. sugar
½ tsp. dried oregano
2 Bartlett pears, cored and sliced
1 cucumber, thinly sliced
1 tomato, cut into wedges
½ cup pitted black olives, or Greek-style olives, drained
4 oz. feta cheese or Monterey Jack cheese, sliced

In medium bowl, combine the oil, vinegar, sugar and oregano. Add the pears and gently mix the dressing to cover the pear but not break it into pieces. In salad bowl, combine the cucumber, tomato, olives and cheese. Mix gently to combine. Spoon the pears out of the dressing and arrange them on the top of the salad. Pour the remaining dressing over the top of the salad. Can be served immediately or may be prepared up to 4 hours ahead. Makes 4 servings.

PEARS AND CHICKEN HAWAIIAN

Quick to prepare, this one-dish meal combines veggies, pears and pineapple with chicken. You might want to substitute canned sliced water chestnuts for the cashews.

4 fresh Anjou pears
1 lb. boned chicken, sliced into strips
3 tbsp. pareve margarine
1 can (8 oz.) pineapple chunks
1 green pepper, seeded and sliced
½ cup cashew nuts
2 tbsp. packed brown sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch
⅓ cup water
2 tbsp. soy sauce

Core and slice pears. Sauté chicken in margarine 3 to 5 minutes or until juices run clear. Drain pineapple; reserve ⅓ cup liquid. Add pears, pineapple, green pepper and cashews to chicken; heat thoroughly. Combine brown sugar, cornstarch, reserved pineapple liquid, water and soy sauce in saucepan. Cook and stir over low heat until mixture thickens; cook 1 minute longer. Pour sauce over pear-chicken mixture and toss gently. Serves 4. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

PEAR AND MAPLE NAPOLEONS

1 pkg. (1 sheet) frozen puff pastry
1 egg beaten with 1 tbsp. water
2 tbsp. butter
3 slightly under-ripe Bartlett pears, peeled, cored and thinly sliced
1 tsp. sugar
¼ tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp pure maple syrup plus ¼ to ⅓ cup extra for drizzling assembled desserts
1 cup heavy whipping cream
1 tbsp. powdered sugar

Thaw pastry sheet at room temperature for 30 minutes. Preheat oven to 375. Unfold pastry dough onto lightly floured board; roll into a 16-in. x 12-in. rectangle. Trim any uneven edges, saving this dough for garnishing. Cut dough into 12 equal portions and place on 2 large baking sheets. If desired, make small pear and leaf designs out of the excess dough, brush bottoms of designs with beaten egg mixture and place on four of the dough squares. Brush these 4 pieces with the beaten egg mixture. Bake for 10 to 12 minutes, or until lightly browned and fluffy; set aside.

Melt the butter in a large skillet. Add the pears, sugar and cinnamon; cook over low heat until pears are browned and very soft, about 30 minutes. Stir in 1 tbsp. of the maple syrup and let mixture cool.

In a medium mixing bowl, beat cream until soft peaks form; add remaining 1 tbsp. maple syrup and powdered sugar; continue beating until stiff peaks form.

To prepare napoleons, place 4 undecorated pastry squares on individual plates. (Reserve the decorated pieces for the top layer). Top with dollop of sweetened cream and some of the pear slices. Place a second layer of pastry atop the pears and repeat layers of cream and pears. Top with decorated pastry square. Drizzle dessert generously with maple syrup, dust with powdered sugar and serve. Makes 4 servings.

Custody and religious rights

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Question. I have been separated from my ex-wife for over 5 years and have custody & primary residency of our son, age 6 since he was 2 years old. Neither myself nor my ex-wife are religious but my ex-wife does celebrate some of the Jewish cultural activities. She claims that our son is Jewish and demands that he miss school on days that are Jewish Holidays. Does she have this right?

Answer. Yes, if she truly practices Judaism. Canadian law technically gives you the sole right to decide the child's religious upbringing since you are the custodial parent. However, it curiously also gives the access parent, in this case the mother, the right to enjoy her religious traditions and to introduce her religion to the child on her time with him even if it appears to contradict your religious philosophy.

Normally, these seemingly inconsistent rules are interpreted to mean that mother can take the child to synagogue and introduce Judaism with the child on her time and you can introduce your take on religion in any way you want when the child is with you. The reason is that in Canada we live in a multicultural country and the Courts show great deference to this tradition ensconced in Canada's constitution, particularly Article 27. Canadian children are not, in fact, confused by their parents' differing religious positions if the parents are tolerant of each other and don't allow their differences to upset the children.

The Courts enforce this principle by allowing the access parent maximum freedom when it comes to religious instruction, subject only to the rare situation where a child could be in some physical danger, e.g Jehovah's Witness cases where a parent refuses to allow blood transfusions for a seriously ill child. In your case I suspect that a Court would likely give your wife extra access to your child on her religious holidays, which by definition means that she could remove the child from school on those Jewish religious Holy Days that mandate this practice.

However, if she simply demanded that the child stay home from school without herself spending time with him on those same religious days then she may well have a problem. She cannot ask you to practice her religion for her because then she is imposing her religious traditions on you. In other words, if she wants her child to act as a faith-based Jew then she must obey her God as well. Israeli police urge AG to charge Katsav

JERUSALEM — For the first time since Israel's creation, the president of the country failed to attend an opening session of the Knesset.

President Moshe Katsav, who has been the subject of criminal investigations on allegations of sexual impropriety, did not attend the opening of the Knesset's winter session on Monday.

The previous day, police recommended to Attorney General Menachem Mazuz that he indict Katsav on charges of rape, sexual misconduct and other offences.

For the past three months, police have investigated allegations that Katsav committed several acts of sexual misconduct – ranging from harassment to rape – against women employed by him in various government offices.

Police said Sunday that they had gathered sufficient evidence to recommend indicting the president on charges of rape, as well as indecent acts using force, indecent acts without consent and sexual harassment offences.

The police also told Mazuz that there was enough evidence that Katsav had committed grand larceny, fraud and breach of trust, and violated a law against wiretapping. Police said they were still gathering evidence to support further suspicions that Katsav may also have harassed a witness and disrupted judicial procedures.

In addition to the evidence about Katsav's alleged sexual crimes, police said there is sufficient evidence to press charges against him for having listened in on the conversations of employees of the president's residence and of improprieties related to his decisions to grant pardons.

Moshe Katsav

Katsav's lawyer, Zion Amir, told the Jerusalem Post he was "shocked by the fact that the police recommendations were so sweeping."

Amir noted that during the past 10 years, police have recommended pressing charges against all prime ministers that they had investigated, but none of the cases ever went to trial.

"In the final analysis, the decision belongs to the attorney general and to him alone," Amir said. "I suggest we await his decision."

Amir told Israel Radio Monday that Katsav would resign if an indictment is served against him.

Amir's statement came as sources close to the president insisted that Katsav was not currently intending to resign. According to these sources, the president was still hoping Mazuz wouldn't act on police recommendations and would refrain from serving an indictment. "At this time, the president has no intention of quitting or suspending himself from his position," the sources said.

Although he has refrained from saying so in public so far, Mazuz believes Katsav should step aside until the state makes a final decision on whether the evidence justifies a criminal indictment in order to save Israelis from further embarrassment and confusion.

But even if Mazuz makes such a declaration, it will be a moral statement rather than a legal opinion, since he has no power to order Katsav to do so.

Meanwhile, at least 20 MKs from Labor, Meretz, Likud, Kadima and NU-NRP had announced that they would stage various forms of protest if Katsav had entered the Knesset plenum. Traditionally, MKs rise for the president's arrival. However, the MKs were planning to walk out of the room or remain seated to protest Katsav's attendance.

Half a dozen MKs had also signed a request to begin Knesset proceedings to force Katsav's resignation. A minimum of 20 MKs must sign the request before it can be officially processed.

"At this point it is clear that the president must resign to save the dignity of his position," said Education Minister Yuli Tamir. "If he does not, then it will become necessary for the Knesset to take its own steps to remove him."

But a few MKs stood firmly behind the president. Likud MK Michael Eitan said Katsav's decision not to attend the opening of Knesset wasn't an admission of guilt and showed that he put "the dignity of the presidency above his personal struggle to prove his innocence."

IDF's performance during war probed

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Commanders who did not fully understand their orders, who were not present with their troops during important battles and even failed to fulfil basic missions were only some of the grave failures found by an internal Israel Defence Forces committee that probed Division 91's performance during the recent war in Lebanon.

Led by Maj.-Gen. Yoram (Ya'Ya) Yair, the committee probed Division 91, which was responsible for the border with Lebanon and led by Brig.-Gen. Gal Hirsch, on a number of levels, from operational plans drawn up within the division to the handling of logistical issues, as well as the division's integration with the top IDF command.

According to a high-ranking officer involved in the probe, Hirsch and his men were questioned over a five-week period during which they were asked "tough and probing" questions about the way the division functioned during the war. One of the problems found during the probe was in the way tactical orders were composed, sometimes without a time element. Since the orders were not clear, they were changed, in some cases, on an hourly basis.

"Brigade commanders did not properly understand their missions," the high-ranking officer said. "They didn't know what their goals were and how long they had to fulfill their missions."

Due to the lack of clarity in the orders, "military forces moved forward and then backward, forward and then backward." In one case, the officer said an entire battalion sat in the same location for several days without moving, and when the commander finally received orders to push deeper into enemy territory, he was confused and failed to fulfil the mission. The probe further found that territory that had been conquered by the IDF was later abandoned and then conquered again.

Except for Paratrooper Brigade Commander Col. Hagai Mordechai, all of the brigade commanders whose troops were fighting in Lebanon spent their time in war rooms set up along the northern border but did not set foot behind enemy lines. "This impacted their understanding of what was going on during the fighting," the officer said.

The officer called on commanders to take responsibility for their performance during the war. "A commander needs to look at himself as if the fate of the entire war lies on his shoulders and as if there is no one else who can fulfil his mission," said the officer. "A commander needs to know to take responsibility immediately and not wait for his superior officers to push him out."

The probe also found that commanders were not devoted to their missions and in some cases even decided to ignore orders so as not to risk the lives of their soldiers. The overall sense within Division 91, the officer claimed, was that Israel was not at war and that the operations in Lebanon were "standard and routine."

"Since they didn't fully digest that the country was at war, then the missions were not given the correct amount of weight and importance by the commanders," said the officer.

Despite the severe failures, the committee, led by Yair, does not plan at this stage to recommend personal sanctions against division commanders and officers. Instead, the committee will review a number of specific cases in which battalion commanders allegedly failed to fulfil their missions and drastically strayed from military norms.

Three other divisions will present interim findings over the coming weeks, including Division 162, headed by Brig.-Gen. Guy Zur, an elite reserve division commanded by Brig.-Gen. Eyal Eizenberg and an armoured reserve division led by Brig.-Gen. Erez Zuckerman.

Environmentalists condemn Jerusalem expansion plan

By ETGAR LEFKOVITS
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — A controversial building plan that would expand Jerusalem westward despite the bitter objection of environmentalists was drawn up only after the government made a political decision not to expand the city to the east, the plan's chief architect says.

The proposal, named after the internationally renowned architect Moshe Safdie who designed the original plan, would see the construction of 20,000 housing units on more than 26 square kilometres of natural woodland west of Jerusalem, in one of the largest construction projects ever proposed in Israel.

"If the government had decided to make a building plan to the east of Jerusalem, they never would have approached me to make a plan for the expansion of the city westward," Safdie said in an interview with the Jerusalem Post.

The proposal, which has been on the drawing board for much of the last decade and has the backing of the Jerusalem Municipality, was to receive final approval this past Tuesday from the Interior Ministry's national planning and building committee.

Safdie, although clearly piqued by the criticism of his plan, said he refused to take sides in the debate, suggesting it should be left to the public domain.

Last month, in an unusual show of cross-party unity, 50 Knesset members from across the political spectrum joined forces in opposition to the plan. The parliamentarians who signed a petition prepared by environmental groups against the building plan came from all the Knesset parties, including left-wing and right-wing legislators and a rare mix of secular, religious and haredi parties.

In what has become the largest environmental struggle in Israel in years, the green groups opposed to the plan presented the petition to Interior Minister Roni Bar-On on Sunday, and planned a Tuesday morning protest outside the Interior Ministry offices during the critical ministry committee meeting.

Moshe Safdie

The committee, which is an independent body, has 31 members, including eight publicly appointed officials.

A last-minute petition to the High Court of Justice was filed by an environmental group against Tuesday's planned meeting because at least two of the slots reserved for public officials had not been filled.

Proponents of the city's westward expansion plan, including Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski, argue that it is essential for the natural growth of Jerusalem, with its notoriously high real estate prices and continuing Jewish immigration.

The plan to expand Jerusalem westward in the face of mounting opposition gathered steam in the wake of the government's decision to freeze an alternate, decades-old proposal to expand Jerusalem eastward to the nearby West Bank settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim.

That eastward expansion plan, commonly known as E1, was frozen last year in the wake of American pressure not to build in the West Bank.

Safdie said political reality indicates there is very little chance that the eastward expansion proposal would ever be approved, adding that its proposed size was also more limited.

He said that building between Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim would cut off Palestinian territorial continuity in the West Bank.

"The people who are against the westward plan are rightists who want to build to the east, and green-loving bleeding heart leftists," Safdie said.

The government's decision to freeze the expansion of Jerusalem eastward led an external consultant to endorse the westward expansion of the city in its stead, as part of an ongoing effort to buttress the dwindling Jewish population of Jerusalem.

U.K. groups call for arms embargo of Israel

By JONNY PAUL
Jerusalem Post

LONDON — A London-based non-governmental organization, the Campaign Against Arms Trade (CAAT), has launched a campaign calling for an arms embargo on Israel, accusing the British government of "complicity in the occupation."

CAAT, which has joined forces with several other groups with a history of anti-Israel activism, including the Palestinian Solidarity Campaign, War on Want and the Israeli Committee against House Demolitions (ICAHD), has called for "an immediate, comprehensive arms embargo on all parties involved in the conflict and in particular Israel."

The new joint initiative, Stop Arming Israel, lists all the U.K. companies that supply Israel and gives advice on actions to build support for an embargo.

Ready-made postcards, which the group provides for people to sign and send to members of Parliament, state: "Israel has violated more UN resolutions than any other country. Its increasingly bloody occupation of Palestine has plunged the whole region into a crisis."

The group claims the U.K. government buys arms from Israeli companies that have been "battle-tested in the occupied territories."

The group's policies apply to all countries to which the United Kingdom sells weapons, said CAAT media co-ordinator Symon Hill. However, according to the group's bimonthly publication, CAAT News, a campaign against Hezbollah's weaponry is not necessary as the weapons are "low-tech" and not made in the U.K., while Israel's Apache helicopters and F-16 jets "contain key parts" made in the U.K.

A 2002 CAAT report refers to "the killing of Palestinian men, women and children, extra-judicial executions, arbitrary detention and deportation of prisoners, collective punishment, torture, attacks on hospitals and ambulances, curfews and other restrictions on freedom of movement and the wholesale destruction of homes."

The onus for the recent hostilities in Lebanon is on Israel, according to a recent CAAT News article, "Southern Lebanon Destroyed, Now Stop Arming Israel." Hezbollah's assault on northern Israel is described as "a response."

The same article also blames Israel for the situation in Gaza.

"A year after a supposed IDF withdrawal from Gaza, its one million inhabitants have to endure repeated military incursions, assassinations, sonic booms from low-flying aircraft and other forms of collective punishment for the armed resistance of a small minority," it says.

Israel is at the "cutting edge" of global weapons technology, according to CAAT, which also says that Israel was the leading supplier of arms to apartheid South Africa and currently sells to Burma's military junta.

Sarah Mandel, associate editor of the NGO Monitor, said War on Want and ICAHD have a long history of promoting anti-Israeli discrimination.

"War on Want claims to pursue a humanitarian agenda, but is being investigated by the U.K. Charity Commission for its highly politicized activities – calls for sanctions, divestment and boycotts. ICAHD, a small extremist group, has been given international prominence by its European Union funding. Its ostensible human rights projects call for a one-state solution [the destruction of Israel] and its use of polarizing rhetoric undermines all hope for progress towards mutual understanding between Israelis and Palestinians," she said.

Mandell added that the lack of any call for Syria and Iran to stop arming Hezbollah and Hamas "makes a mockery of U.K. and E.U. funding for such NGOs."

In related Israel boycott developments, the American Federation of Teachers (AFT) is calling on Irish academics to oppose demands to boycott Israel. The union, which represents 1.3 million members across the United States, sent a letter to four Irish teachers' and academic unions, urging them to oppose the boycott proposed by several Irish academics in recent weeks.

The boycott call was made by 61 Irish faculty members in a letter sent to the Irish Times in late September. They called for the European Union to cut ties with Israeli academic institutions in protest of Israel's policy towards the Palestinians and its conduct during the Lebanese war.

"All of the world's issues run through that embassy at one point or another," said Allen, who spent much of his early career in the legal bureau of Foreign Affairs Canada, representing Canada in disputes under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and leading Canadian delegations to various UN conferences.

"But in many ways, Israel rivals Washington because there is so much interesting discussion, so many issues on the table, so many different points of view, and a very high level of political discourse here," he said.

"Whether it's Iran, or the Israel-Palestine issue, or the region as a whole, the issues that affect Israel are always making front page news. Israel is a fascinating place. You can be sure that there is always something interesting and compelling going on here."

Allen hopes that as Canada's new representative in Israel, he will be able to push some of those issues forward. "We already co-operate on foreign policy and on military issues and issues of terrorism, and on those scores, we see the world from very similar points of view.

"But I think there are other areas where we haven't necessarily tapped all the potential," he said. He noted that he would like to expand Canada and Israel's co-operation in a number of areas: environmental sustainability, transportation security, agriculture, water conservation, energy co-operation, and even cultural/artistic exchanges.

"With the strong support that the Harper government has demonstrated for Israel, and the mutual feelings and good relationships that we have built up between our foreign ministries, we have a golden opportunity here to take our relationship to the next level," Allen said.

"Of course, anything that Canada can do to contribute to peace processes – as an honest broker and as a strong ally – the government will be looking for opportunities to this effect, and I am here to carry that out.

"I am hoping to do the best job possible in what are generally considered to be the both difficult and interesting circumstances that prevail in Israel," he said.

Speaking about being appointed so soon after the war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, he said: "This post-Lebanon period is a very interesting time," he says. "I am here to see Israel undergo this unbelievable rebuilding phase."

Allen and his wife, Clara Hirsh, spent a weekend recently travelling to various art festivals across Israel's north, including the All the Music in the Galil Festival, the 22nd International Film Festival in Haifa and the Acco Fringe Theater Festival.

"It was amazing to see places which just a couple of months ago were under attack, being bombed [by Hezbollah], but on the weekend they were chock-a-block with people," said Allen.

"There certainly is an incredible resilience, no doubt about it; whether it's because there have been previous wars and they've had to get back to it, or because there is just a love of life, and the people refuse not to get back to it, I don't know. But Israelis get back into the swing of things and it's amazing to see."

For Allen, the youngest of three, born in 1950, the appointment to Israel has both professional and personal benefits. Allen's sister made aliyah from Winnipeg in the 1960s and lives on Kibbutz Kfar Blum in the Galil, so coming to Israel also means reuniting with her and her three children.

"Previous to the appointment, I had been to Israel a number of times to visit my sister," said Allen, who last visited two years ago for his nephew's wedding. His father was a strong Zionist, and a big supporter of the Technion in Haifa and the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

"Actually living here presents a great opportunity for me and my sister to be closer to one another," Allen said.

Hirsh, who moved with her family from Poland to Winnipeg in 1959, also has an aunt and a few cousins in Israel. "So we both have this personal connection to Israel, and although that's not what motivated the posting, it is an added advantage," said Allen.

In addition to meeting with family since they arrived, the pair have spent most of their time meeting and greeting Israelis from all walks of life. "The country is full of interesting people, and we have just begun to meet a few of them," he said. "People have really gone out of their way to extend us a very warm welcome."

In their downtime, the couple, who live in the official ambassador's residence in Herzliya Pituach, play tennis and swim.

That's not to say that their adjustment to Israel has been without blips. Allen said he's finding it a challenge to get used to driving in Israel. "Some drivers in Israel are incredibly reckless. I don't know whether it's postwar tension and anxiety, or what, but you can really sense that people feel under pressure on the roads.

"Driving here really gives you the impression that Israelis are yearning for some calm in their lives, and in the country. Then again, I have driven in Mexico City, and I have driven in India, so this kind of driving is not completely unfamiliar to me."

In spite of the driving, Allen doesn't miss Canada. "I especially don't miss the winters in Winnipeg," he said, adding that he does miss his two children – Jake, 23, and AJ, 21 – who are studying at McGill University. "The experiences abroad have just been too fascinating and too varied for me to miss Canada too much."

Allen, who obtained a law degree from the University of Western Ontario in 1976 and a master of law degree from the University of London in 1997, joined the then-Department of External Affairs in 1981. He participated in diplomatic missions to Mexico City, from 1983 to 1985; and New Delhi, from 1989 to 1992. In Washington, D.C., from 1997 to 2001, he was minister counsellor and head of the political section of Foreign Affairs Canada and director general of the ministry's North American bureau, from 2001 to 2004. As director general, he was responsible for Canada's bilateral relations with the United States and Mexico.

Israel Briefs

Olmert thanks Harper

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert spoke by phone last week with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. Olmert thanked Harper for Canada's support for Israel at the Francophonie summit. Olmert also thanked Harper for Canada's backing of the decision by the "Quartet" (the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union) to demand that the Palestinians recognize Israel, renounce violence and honour signed treaties.

Netanyahu's star rises

Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud Party would win if elections had been held last week, a poll found. The Yediot Achronot survey, published Oct. 12, found Likud would win 22 of the Knesset's 120 seats, almost twice its current number. Avigdor Lieberman's right-wing Yisrael Beiteinu Party would place second with 20 seats, and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's centrist Kadima Party would be third with 15 seats, almost half its current 29.

Israel backs UN Iran moves

Israel endorsed a decision to discuss Iran's nuclear program at the UN Security Council. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert convened top cabinet colleagues and Israeli military and intelligence chiefs last week for a top-secret discussion of how to handle Iranian atomic ambitions, especially after North Korea's recent nuclear test.

Rocket defence years away

Israel isn't expected to have defense systems against tactical rockets within the next four years, a newspaper reported. The Jerusalem Post quoted unnamed military officials who said it will take at least four years to develop a system that can be deployed along the Lebanese and Gaza borders. Two anti-rocket projects are being considered, one Israeli and the other American.

Russian Jews upset by anti-Georgian crackdown

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
JTA

MOSCOW — When hundreds rallied last week in downtown Moscow to protest the Russian crackdown on Georgians, many of the protesters had yellow stars pinned to their chests.

The Oct. 8 rally was called to voice criticism of the deportation of hundreds of Georgians and closure of Georgian-owned businesses in Moscow in the wake of Russia's spy dispute with the small Caucasus republic.

The yellow stars were symbols that the protesters – who included many well-known Russian liberal figures – view the Russian authorities' singling out of Georgians as similar to what happened to Jews during the Holocaust, when Jews in many European countries were forced to wear yellow stars as identification.

"To me, the key word here is mass deportation," said Alexandra Arkus, a Jewish pediatrician who had a yellow star pinned to her denim jacket alongside a homemade button pin saying "I'm a Georgian."

"The Holocaust is part of my own family history, and it doesn't make big difference if it's not me who is being targeted this time."

A leading Russian Jewish political journalist who also took part in the rally agreed.

"It doesn't matter which group is singled out for ethnic profiling," Yevgenia Albats said. "Our books, our history do not allow us to sit idle," in this situation, she said.

Russian Jewish groups, however, have not spoken out publicly on the matter.

Up to 600,000 Georgian nationals are believed to be living in Russia, including thousands of Georgian-born Jews. Many Georgians in Russia earn their living as construction workers, taxi drivers or in markets.

There are also a number of high-profile Georgian businessmen based in Russia.

Following the diplomatic dispute between Moscow and Georgia earlier this month, Russian police and tax officials cracked down on Georgian natives living in Russia in what authorities called part of the fight against illegal immigrants and tax evasion.

The crackdown resulted in the deportations of hundreds of Georgians and caused many more Georgians to close their businesses and lose their jobs.

Earier this month, Russian newspapers reported that some Moscow schools were asked to provide lists of Georgian students to the officials so their parents can be tracked down and checked for residence and tax status.

A leading human rights group condemned the "collective blame" that Russian authorities are putting on Georgians in Russia as a result of the "irresponsible actions of Georgian authorities."

> 'Our books, our history do not allow us to sit idle'

The Moscow Bureau on Human Rights said the "multiple facts of discrimination against citizens of Georgian nationality in Russian regions" was "an outrageous violation" of the Russian Constitution.

Ethnic profiling is not new in modern Russia, but by cracking down on Georgians the authorities have crossed a certain barrier, critics say.

"When police were cracking down on Chechens" during the 1990s, "this was during the war and could at least be explained as part of the wartime rhetoric," Arkus said. "What's unfolding now simply borders on Nazism."

Many Russians, however, disagree.

According to a recent poll, 40 per cent of Russians welcome the deportation of all Georgians who don't have legal residency in Russia, while the same proportion favours imposing economic blockade on Georgia, and 20 per cent support cutting off all trade relations between Russia and Georgia, the VTSIOM polling firm reported.

While many Jews in Russia appear to be more sensitive to ethnic profiling than average Russians, Jewish organizations remained silent in the wake of police and officials' crackdown on the Georgian minority.

"We cannot afford speaking out on this," an official with a leading Jewish group, who asked not to be identified, told JTA.

"If we say something, the authorities will tell us we are shaking the boat," he said, referring to the fact all major Jewish groups value their relations with the Kremlin, which is believed to be orchestrating the anti-Georgian campaign.

A spokesperson for the Federation of Jewish Communities, the largest organization of Jews in Russia, said in an interview with JTA that he believes the persecution of Georgians is "very dangerous."

"I hope this is the very first and therefore excessively emotional reaction" to the dispute with Georgia, Boruch Gorin said.

Educational excellence, new campus and green space at The Toronto Heschel School!

Imagine your child at a Jewish day school complete with a huge green field, a space used for physical activity, leading-edge education and just plain old fun.

Imagine your child being a part of a vibrant Jewish learning community.

Imagine your child using his or her creativity in research-based learning activities. Imagine your child developing a strong environmental ethos while participating in hands-on science activities. Imagine your child's mind being developed through innovative learning. Imagine your child being inspired to make a difference in the world.

You are imagining The Toronto Heschel School.

"Our beautiful new six-acre green space allows us to put our environmental ethos into practice," says principal Gail Baker. "Now that we have such fantastic, flexible space, it's been amazing to see how much learning can actually move seamlessly from inside to outside."

Baker adds, "In addition to the teaching garden and recycling program, our school also conducts classes such as Chumash, Hebrew and math outside. The children love sitting and learning in the outdoor classrooms under the big trees."

The grounds are not the only impressive feature of the new campus. It also has 20 large classrooms – including particularly spacious preschool rooms – as well as a computer lab, a resource room, an art room, a music room, a beit midrash, a gymnasium and more.

Innovative teaching methods are also part of educational excellence at Heschel. "Since 1996, we've strived to foster Jewish values and a love of Jewish identity in children's hearts and minds," says curriculum director Greg Beiles. "Our day is integrated. We don't separate secular and Judaic studies into half-days, as do most day schools. This integration allows the children to see the world as if through two overlaid lenses all day long, a universal lens and a Jewish lens. The children will then be comfortable living full Jewish lives as part of the wider community."

"My kids are getting a fantastic education," says parent Ashira Gobrin, who has two daughters at Heschel. "It's more than solid math and science skills. They are learning to imagine. They are using their creativity to think outside the box and solve problems." Suzy Rosenstein, whose three sons attend Heschel, shares that enthusiasm. "The boys are learning to love their Jewish heritage. But more importantly, they are learning to become engaged citizens, locally and globally. It's quite something to see."

American idealist aided artists, intellectuals in Vichy France

Villa Air-Bel: World War II, Escape and a House in Marseille* by Rosemary Sullivan, HarperCollins.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Varian Fry, a young American idealist, arrived in Nazi-occupied France on Aug. 15, 1941, a sum of $3,000 in cash taped to his leg. Clad in a Brooks Brothers pinstriped suit, he also carried a sleeping bag and an air mattress, a list of 200 European artists and intellectuals he intended to help and letters of introduction from the U.S State Department.

So began one of the most intriguing, if little-known, humanitarian missions of World War II.

A 32-year-old Harvard graduate, Fry went to France as the representative of the American Emergency Rescue Committee, which had been established to assist the artistic elite of Europe.

As part of its capitulation to Germany in June 1940, Vichy France agreed to "surrender on demand" all German nationals and citizens of conquered countries who had publicly expressed criticism of the Nazi regime and had fled to France seeking asylum.

The individuals Germany sought to extradite were both Jewish and Christian, and included novelist Thomas Mann and painter Marc Chagall. Fry's intention was to whisk them out of France as soon as possible, lest they be interned and/or murdered by the rapacious Nazis.

As they waited for their exit visas, some found a temporary haven in Villa Air-Bel, an imposing, three-storey, 18-room mansion on a hill outside the southern French port of Marseille. It had been expressly rented to accommodate them.

Rosemary Sullivan, a professor of English at the University of Toronto and an award-winning biographer, has written a vivid account of this episode. Villa Air-Bel: World War II, Escape and a House in Marseille is a strong narrative work that burnishes her reputation as a meticulous researcher and a fluid writer.

Sullivan, whose biographies of Canadian literary figures Margaret Atwood and Gwendolyn MacEwen are already classics, has a gift for humanizing history. And in Villa Air-Bel, this is precisely what she achieves.

The central character, Fry, is a handsome, charismatic man who had a passion for liberal political causes. A magazine editor until his sojourn in France, he felt that the United States should jettison its isolationist policy, stop Adolf Hitler in his tracks and help imperilled progressive Europeans.

Fry's interest in, and commitment to, such causes was cemented by a trip to swastika-bedecked Berlin in 1935, where he witnessed a random anti-Semitic attack on an elderly Jewish couple. The ugly incident galvanized him, and in the years to come, he would extend a helping hand to refugees in France.

With Hitler's accession to power in 1933, many Jews and dissidents fled Germany, bound for France. At first, they were warmly received, though right-wing newspapers regarded them as "German invaders who were taking the bread out of French mouths."

With the fall of Leon Blum's Popular Front government in 1938, during the depths of the Depression, the refugees found themselves on hard times. The new prime minister, Edouard Daladier, a supporter of appeasement, declared that the refugees were no longer worthy of French hospitality and should be "controlled."

Rightists, meanwhile, called for their internment. Eventually, the refugees were dispatched to internment camps. Among them were Otto Meyerhoff, the winner of the 1922 Nobel Prize in medicine, and Thadeus Reichstein, the discoverer of cortisone and the recipient of the 1950 Nobel Prize for medicine.

Conditions for the refugees deteriorated after France's defeat in the war. As Sullivan says, they lived in constant fear of being deported.

When Fry reached Marseille in the summer of 1941, refugees who sought to escape the hell of Vichy France needed several documents: a safe-conduct pass to travel within France; an exit permit to leave the country; a transit visa to travel overland via Spain and Portugal to board a ship in Lisbon; a visa to a country willing to accept them.

Thanks to Eleanor Roosevelt, President Franklin Roosevelt's humane wife, Fry had acquired quasi-diplomatic status when he arrived in Marseille. Fry assumed that he could get the job done within a matter of weeks and return to New York City by the end of August. But in October, he prolonged his visit, informing his wife in a cable that he could not "abandon" the refugees in his care.

Varian Fry

Several days later, the Vichy regime enacted new anti-Semitic regulations, the statut des juifs, and authorized the internment of "all foreign Jews in camps" or in "residences in remote villages where they could remain under the watchful eyes of the local police."

To assist the refugees in distress, Fry and his confrères rented Villa Air-Bel and established the Centre Americain de Secours (CAS).

They also enlisted the services of two German dissidents, Lisa and Hans Fittko, to guide refugees over the Pyrenees mountains to safety in neutral Spain. One of their "clients" was the renowned German-Jewish philosopher Walter Benjamin. Having reached a Spanish border post, he was callously told that he could not proceed any farther. In despondency, he committed suicide. A priceless manuscript he had carried in his briefcases disappeared, never to resurface.

Sullivan's chapters on the Fittkos and on political developments in Europe that impinged on the lives of refugees are interesting, though slightly padded. But the beating heart of her book concerns Air-Bel, the rambling villa where the refugees while away their days while waiting for their travel papers to the United States. The villa, she notes, provided "a respite from harsher realities" just outside its portals. In Marseille, for example, Jews were being victimized.

Sullivan portrays American diplomats in Marseille as heartless creatures who curried favour with Vichy and could not care a whit about Fry and his project. When the U.S. consul there, Hugh Fullerton, called Fry into his office for a chat, he could only tell him that the Vichy regime was "uncomfortable" with his "refugee work."

The police inevitably raided Air-Bel and summoned Fry for a grilling. After he was arrested, Fry was forced to leave France. Vichy could do without troublemakers like him. With Fry gone, Air-Bel was summarily emptied of its residents. But by that point, Fry had accomplished a lot.

Over a period of one and a half years, he managed to protect more than 4,000 refugees, facilitated the departure of 1,500 people from France and threw a financial lifeline to 600 others.

With the Air-Bel interregnum behind him, Fry became a freelance writer and teacher. Five months before his death on Sept. 12, 1967, just shy of his 60th birthday, France belatedly honoured him for his good deeds. In 1996, Yad Vashem – the Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem – posthumously named Fry as a righteous gentile.

During his lifetime, the United States never officially recognized his heroic actions, though Warren Christopher, a U.S. secretary of state, belatedly conveyed apologies to Fry on behalf of Americans.

At Fry's funeral, the Jewish sculptor Jacques Lipchitz, whom Fry had helped, said in a eulogy, "He was like a racehorse hitched to a wagonload of stones." These poetic words spoke volumes.

In closing, Sullivan adds that Villa Air-Bel was torn down in 1970 and replaced by a faceless apartment complex for new immigrants, mainly North Africans. One can probably assume that they have never heard of Villa Air-Bel, which, after Sullivan's book, has taken on a life of its own.

Mother-daughter team aim to 'make the impossible possible'

What do the Everything To Do With Sex Show and the Weekend To End Breast Cancer have in common?

Team Bubble Boobs, which supports the Weekend To End Breast Cancer, has an exhibit at the upcoming Everything To Do With Sex Show (ETDWSS) in Toronto.

Team Bubble Boobs is made up of Jai and Stephanie Cole, a mother and daughter team registered to participate in the 2007 Weekend To End Breast Cancer fundraising event, which benefits Princess Margaret Hospital.

"Breast cancer is on the dark side of everything sexy and generally invisible at fun events like the ETDWSS," says Stephanie, the daughter half of team Bubble Boobs. "Awareness and education go hand in hand with raising the necessary funds to win the war against this insidious disease. Our exhibit will make the invisible visible. The ETDWSS is attended by 50,000+ people, and it is the perfect environment to do just that."

The booth will have information about breast cancer, survivorship programs and research from Princess Margaret Hospital, and a representative from the Weekend To End Breast Cancer will be there to answer questions about the walk and register walkers for the 2007 event.

Team Bubble Boobs will be raising sponsorship dollars through direct donations and the sale of unique products, from sexy pink ribbon toe rings to cuddly pink ribbon teddy bears.

A pair of gigantic lifelike breasts that can be filled with donations will be the main attraction. Bubble Boobs' goal is to completely "fill 'em up" with dollars by the end of the show.

"I have participated in the Weekend to End Breast Cancer's 60-kilometre walk as a walker and as crew from the first event in 2003," says Jai Cole, the mother half of the team. "The experience of being with more than 6,000 people, all set on the same goal, is truly incredible. We are excited about having the opportunity to educate, entertain and raise the needed funds at the Everything To Do With Sex Show."

"Together we are empowered to make the impossible possible" is the slogan created by the Cole team. In 2005 and 2006, Team Bubble Boobs was part of the volunteer motor crew driving a sweep vehicle that assisted walkers along the route. Jai participated as a walker in 2003 and 2004.

Jai and Stephanie believe awareness and early diagnosis are major facctors in the fight to save people's lives. The funds raised by the Weekend to End Breast Cancer's 60-km walk go to Princess Margaret Hospital for breast cancer treatment, research and education. The hospital is an international leader in the fight against cancer and the largest institution in Canada devoted to cancer treatment, innovative research, and education programs.

Princess Margaret focuses on translational research – research findings that are quickly transformed into improved treatment options and enhanced patient care. For the 2006 event, 5,382 walkers raised $17.2 million. Next year's walk is scheduled for Sept. 7 to 9, 2007. For information, go to www.endcancer.ca.

Now in its seventh year, the Everything To Do With Sex show draws curious adults who want to explore their sexuality. Topics covered range from romantic dinners to sexual bondage. Organizers present sex and everything to do with it in a fun, non-threatening environment that appeals to couples and singles alike. It takes place at the Automotive Building at Exhibition Place Oct. 20 to 22. Admission is restricted to age 19 and over. For information, go to www.everythingtodowithsexshow.com.

For more information on the Team Bubble effort, contact Stephanie Cole, at 905-695-0123, ext. 211, or steph@plumcom.ca.

Eating disorders program planned for Temple Sinai

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A three-session program on eating disorders and other addictive behaviour, called the Kedushat HaGuf Project, will be held Sundays, beginning Oct. 22, at Temple Sinai Congregation.

Supported by the Bernstein Family Endowment, the groups will be facilitated by Orit Morse. She has had 20 years of counselling experience with individuals, families and groups in several mental health settings. She now runs New Realities Eating Disorders Recovery Centre in Toronto.

From 5 to 6 p.m., there will be an information and resource group for family, friends and partners of those suffering from an eating disorder or other addictive behaviour. The group from 7 to 8:30 p.m. will be for those suffering from the problem.

Both will offer information and awareness about the problems, as well as community resources that may be of help.

Morse said that the organizers decided to focus on eating disorders because they are relatively so prevalent in the Jewish community. "If the turnout is good, the program will be ongoing," she said.

Admission is free, but registration is necessary.

For more information, call Morse at 905-763-0660.

Art exhibit pays tribute to philanthropist Max Sharp

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Joy Shepherd's artwork was on display at a recent exhibit she held in tribute to her late grandfather, Max Sharp.

To honour the memory of her grandfather, Max Sharp, a philanthropist, community leader and pioneer in building Israel, his granddaughter, Joy Shepherd, held an art show for family and friends recently.

The exhibition of her grandfather's needlepoint works and her watercolours, "Max's Fiddle," had previously been at the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Sharp died just short of his 103rd birthday, on Dec. 4, 2004.

"My paintings tell a story and they are my interpretation of what my grandfather gave the world," Shepherd says.

"My grandfather was my Fiddler on the Roof and inspired me to paint fiddlers. He was a master of needlepoint. [The show] was a tribute to the legacy he left me and all his family."

Shepherd said she was one of the 19 lucky grandchildren to be blessed by a true-to-life Fiddler on the Roof. "My papa Max, who loved to sing and dance, inspired me to paint the fiddlers, which represent his love of life."

Her watercolours express her love and admiration for a person who exemplified all that life should represent, "kindness, compassion and his values that continue to inspire me and my family," she says.

Shepherd is a psychometrist at the Hospital for Sick Children. She has had a passion for art since childhood and, for the past five years, has studied watercolour.

One of her works, The Penthouse, is of the 19 grandchildren around the Friday night dinner table, a tradition in the Sharp family.

"My grandparent's traditions and values have been passed down to my generation – what a memory, what a gift," Shepherd says.

Joy Shepherd with her late grandfather, Max Sharp

Another one of Shepherd's works, The Quintette, tells the story of "my grandfather passing down the fiddle to my father, Siggie Levy, and then from generation to generation. Most of my paintings tell a story of Jewish life and family traditions," she says.

Max and his son, Issy Sharp, were the first father and son to be honoured with a Negev Dinner by the Jewish National Fund, at which their community leadership and service was recognized.

More than 200 people attended Shepherd's exhibition and celebration of her grandfather's life. Sam Sable paid tribute to his longtime friend. Joseph Telch, a Toronto artist, introduced Shepherd and praised her for her love of the arts and for her talent.

The money raised from the exhibition has been donated to Beit Halochem – Aid to Disabled Veterans.

"Israel was my grandfather's lifelong love, and it is appropriate that we make this donation in his honour," Shepherd says.

Artist's friends give him posthumous honour

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Artist Stanley Lewis, who died Aug. 14 at 76 of heart failure, has achieved in death what he did not in life: a solo exhibition at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts.

For one evening earlier this month, 35 of his stone-cut prints and sculptures were on display, most of them on loan from private collectors, who ranged from well-heeled connoisseurs to the waitress Lewis befriended at a St. Laurent Boulevard delicatessen.

The Oct. 4 event was organized by a small group of Lewis' friends, most of whom he met in his latter years and were much younger than him. But it also attracted people who knew him for 50 years or more.

This group is trying to interest the museum or another gallery to mount a full-fledged retrospective of Lewis' work and to ensure that he takes what they believe is his rightful place among Canada's better artists.

Among his new friends was Concordia University film student Jeannette Pope, one of the organizers, who made a seven-minute documentary about Lewis last year titled Where's Stanley?. That was followed this year by the 19-minute The Birth of Smoked Meat, a documentary about the Main Delicatessen, which she credits Lewis with encouraging her to do.

She is hoping to make a full-length portrait of Lewis with the hours of footage she has of him, including interviews during his final hospital stay.

Lewis also has a role in the just-released Posthumous Pickle Party, by Ezra Soiferman, another organizer. It's a tribute to the late Simcha Leibovich, who owned Simcha's Grocery on St. Laurent Boulevard. (Lewis also made a cameo in Garry Beitel's new Chez Schwartz.)

Lewis, who died after being in the Jewish General Hospital for five months, was remembered as a man so totally devoted to his art that his personal relationships suffered and he paid scant attention to the necessity of making a living.

Lewis was, in the words of a longtime friend, physician Phil Gold, "a thoroughly lovable pain in the ass."

Unable to pay his rent, Lewis moved into his dusty studio over Berson Monuments on St. Laurent a couple of years ago, living amid a large number of unsold works and without even a telephone. He became a familiar figure on the Main and at its eateries.

Gold said the only way to reach Lewis was to leave messages at the various restaurants he frequented. "Ultimately, he would get back to you, and say 'What's the problem?'"

Gold said he had always tried – in vain – to impress upon Lewis the need to make a living. "I saw him at the hospital a few days before he died. He promised me he would have a grand show and sell a lot of his work and become a man of leisure. A little later, he called and said he'd changed his mind."

Lewis was amazingly prolific over his 56-year career, and he continued to create obsessively up until his health started to fail about 18 months ago. He had a keen sense of life's evanescence, as one might expect of someone whose studio was upstairs from a gravestone forged himself to carve it exactly as the master had.

Lewis, who lived in Florence from 1956 to 1959, was an authority on Michelangelo's techniques. He was particularly proud of the fact that author Irving Stone consulted him in his research for The Agony and the Ecstasy, a bestselling novel based on Michelangelo's life.

Pope said a friend had offered Lewis a place to live with him, but he flatly refused because he wanted to be on his own to work without disruption, probably sensing that his time was short. Lewis' disregard for money and comfort reflected desire for simplicity, and was not a rejection of society, she feels.

Lewis had a strong social conscience and donated his work when he was touched by an event. In 1990, he gave École Polytechnique a colour print from his series Age of Violence series, in memory of the 14 women murdered there.

Soiferman added that Lewis, whom he met only last year, was not lonely or reclusive. He loved to be out and about in his neighbourhood, and readily endeared himself to people. Soiferman became close to him, visiting him two or three times a week in the hospital for long talks about life and art.

Author Joe King met Lewis 40 years ago when he was producing a documentary on pollution for CTV. Lewis had done a series of prints expressing his concern about pollution.

King said that Lewis had two failed marriages, but one of the good things to come out of his first divorce was his print series The Ten Commandments, for which he traveled to Israel to use Jerusalem stone slabs.

"Charles Bronfman bought 10 of the prints, so Stanley could eat for a week," King said. Lewis was later commissioned to make a bust of Charles's father Samuel Bronfman on his 75th birthday.

Despite the instability of his life, King said Lewis never lost his "joie de vivre." Lewis's work often had esoteric, gloomy themes, but King said he was "one of the few artists who could explain his work, what he was doing and what it meant."

His old friends tried to help him in his last years, but King said Lewis was content "to drift from the Main Delicatessen to Welch's book store."

Noted sculptor Armand Vaillancourt, a contemporary of Lewis, joked that Lewis' problem was being "too inclined to chase women" for his own good. He urged that an effort be made to have Lewis' work seen by the public.

Among the other people participating in the evening were Montreal Jewish historian Allan Raymond, a friend of Lewis for 30 years; Diane Charbonneau, a museum curator; former student Marilyn Berzan-Montblanch; and art expert Gilles Bertrand.

Jewish and Arab students launch a journal

By LINDSAY SOBERANO-WILSON
Special to The CJN

Ran Goel, left, and Meena Rafie hope the second edition of the journal Yalla will create a dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians.
[Mike Andrechuk photo]

Yalla, a journal of creative expression that promotes dialogue and communication among Jewish and Arab youths, is being launched next week in Toronto and Montreal.

The contributors and editors are mainly Jews and Arabs aged 18 to 30. Yalla was launched in 2004 as a publication that was Canadian in scope. The new edition features voices from the United States, England, Jordan, Israel and Palestine.

Yalla's editors are homegrown, with connections to McGill University and the University of Toronto. They include senior Jewish editor Rachel Davidson, senior Arab editor Dina Awad, Jewish editors Lisa Anthony and Ran Goel, and Arab editors Rasha Srouji and Adam Allouba. Meena Rafie, an Afghan Muslim, is the producer.

"The editorial board's mandate is to let the authors speak for themselves. We want to take the reader on a journey with the youth who are tied to the Holy Land, so that they can understand how their lives are affected by this conflict," says Allouba.

The launch will feature readings and performances, which Davidson considers "physical incarnations of our hopes and dreams for Yalla, instead of people on either side of the picket fences screaming at each other.

"Yalla wants to counter the current state of youth empowerment that seems to be largely a manipulation of their collective bodies as weapons for the agendas of politicians on either side of the conflict by demonstrating that their minds, hearts and souls, embodied in their stories, can be a much more powerful means of being heard and making change," Davidson says.

"The idea is that readers will be more exposed to the fact that their isn't one uniform viewpoint of the other and that people want peace – that youth could see that they are a peace-driving force. We would rather live together than die together."

Yalla gives a voice to those who are silenced, says Allouba. "We were also willing to be more controversial this year, knowing that a diversity of views need to be expressed for the reader to get the full range of experiences and opinions tied to this conflict," he says.

However, the editors couldn't include all the diverse opinions and experiences related to the conflict: "Some [people] didn't want to participate, and we feel that there is a big silent space… because these voices are part of the dialogue," says Davidson. "Some people think when you humanize the other you lose, but I think you win."

Yalla consists of poetry, short stories, personal narratives, photos, posters and even jewelry. There is also a new section dedicated to politics. "We hear pain and joy, but the majority of voices come very much from a place of pain," says Davidson. "In acknowledging that pain and validating it as real, perhaps we can move forward, not forgetting painful histories but using them as a starting point towards a more just and peaceful future."

Many funding bodies rejected the project, so instead of the 10,000 books the group planned to publish, Yalla's print run is the same as in 2004 – 2,500.

Funding came from the United Israel Appeal's National Jewish Campus Life, Hillel International, Canadian Friends of Peace Now, the Jewish/Muslim Association at the University of Toronto and various private donors from the Jewish and Arab communities.

A large part of Yalla's funding came from a $4,000 award they won in September 2005 from Forces Avenir, a Quebec organization that promotes student commitment. Yalla won in the mutual aid, peace and justice category.

The Yalla editorial board considers the new edition of the publication to be a beginning – a small step toward peace. Future goals include publishing a yearly anthology, and the board eventually want to create a regional edition: the young people hope to go to the Middle East to help youths there to publish a journal in Hebrew, Arabic and English.

The Toronto launch takes place on Oct. 26 at 7 p.m. at the University of Toronto's Flavelle House, 78 Queen's Park Cres.

Israeli juniors to play two games in Toronto

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Israeli Ice Hockey Federation's (IIHF) junior team is back in Ontario.

Led by former Montreal Canadiens coach Jean Perron, who was behind the Habs bench for their 1986 Stanley Cup win, the juniors are currently on their seventh annual North American tour, which aims to showcase Israel's up-and-coming under-18 players.

After stops in Chicago and New York, the under-18s headed north and played their first Canadian game Oct. 16 at the Nepean Sportsplex in Ottawa. They were arrayed against the Nepean Raiders Midget A squad, and fans were treated to a special bonus game between the Ottawa Senators Alumni and the Jewish Men's Hockey League All-Star Fundraisers.

Daniel Ehrlich rushing the net.

Next up are two highly anticipated matches in Toronto: at Forest Hill Arena on Oct. 19, and on Oct. 21 at North York Centennial Arena for the Friendship Cup at 8 p.m. against a Jewish camp all-star team.

This year's round of exhibition matches holds special import for the IIHF, as many of its players try to recover emotionally from Israel's recent conflict with Hezbollah and rebuild their lives by getting back to the sport they love.

The task hasn't been easy.

"The majority of these players live in the north of Israel. Many lost friends, neighbours and relatives. [The war] had a direct impact on their lives," said Alex Voihanski, chair of marketing and public relations for the IIHF.

What's more, the Canada Center, the team's practice facility in Metullah, Israel's northernmost town, was heavily damaged by rocket fire during the war and remains closed for repairs.

This fact alone is causing much stress for the players, coaches and management, as the temporary loss of their home arena may leave the team behind schedule when it comes to conditioning. But in addition to improving their fitness, the current North American tour provides the juniors with crucial playing time to get team chemistry right.

Come April 15, the Israelis will play in the world under-18 championships in Miscolk, Hungary. They were moved up to Division II group B after a successful 2006 tournament in Romania, and this year they'll face stiff competition from Belgium, Estonia, Hungary, Mexico and Holland.

The Oct. 21 game in Toronto will also carry special significance as players and fans alike will commemorate Thom Farkash, the 23-year-old Toronto-born airman who was killed, along with his commander Tzviki Luft, when his helicopter was shot down in Lebanon on July 24, during the conflict with Hezbollah.

Details of the pre-game ceremony are still being worked out, but the team is determined to honour Farkash. "There will be something for sure before the game," Voihanski said.

The team is urging the Toronto Jewish community to come out to support the players, and to get a glimpse of the impressive talent representing Israel this year.

In what could be a preview of great things to come, on Oct. 9, the Israeli juniors trounced their Chicago opponents 10-1 on the strength of talented forwards such as Israeli-born Canadians Daniel Ehrlich and Eli Sherbatov.

Though their last games in Toronto garnered extra media attention due to the NHL lockout, Voihanski hopes the Jewish community will still show up in force to validate the teams' enduring affection for the city.

"The team loves Toronto! They feel like it's their second home," Voihanski said. "They always feel so welcomed. It should be a wonderful event for everyone."

Plans are in the works to televise the Oct. 21 game, and the team suggests that fans try to arrive at least 15 minutes prior to match time in order to take in the planned ceremony for Farkash, as well as to show their support for Israel's hockey program and inspire the players before they head home the next day.

Local fans show their support.

Why geriatrics? An indirect path

By MICHAEL GORDON

I have done a lot of public and professional speaking on eldercare for much of my 30-year career. At the end of many speaking engagements, I am asked what led me to my interest in geriatrics. I was in the first group of Canadians who received the certificates of specialization from the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada in 1981. When asking about my career path, the questioner often assumes that it was a field I was destined to pursue.

The Senior Side of Life

The truth is that geriatrics was never a planned career. It is a field that I fell upon without any special focused interest or training, but rather because of a combination of circumstances and people that coalesced at a critical point in my life. I make this point because I find too many young people looking at their futures are concerned that they do not know what they might want to do. In the high school and university career-planning processes, many students are told that they have to "focus" and "decide" what they want to do, otherwise they risk not getting where they want to go.

I believe that erroneous premise and pressure to "decide" can stifle intellectual and emotional exploration and growth that might include a few bad choices. I can unreservedly say that I never planned to be a geriatrician and only decided to go into medicine because of a novel I read in my last year of high school. The Citadel, by A.J. Cronin, was not required reading for my English class, but I chose it because of my love of literature, which was probably an outcome of my father's practice of taking my sister and me to the Brooklyn Public Library every Saturday – a practice I undertake today with my teenaged children.

The Citadel propelled me into medicine, and by chance I chose to study in Scotland, at the University of St. Andrews, although the medical school was in a not very romantic part of Dundee, which at the time was a remnant of the Industrial Revolution with its jute manufacturing factories and rows of walk-up low-rise tenements. Fortunately, I was exposed to excellent geriatric medicine in Dundee, but never thought of it as a career choice as my focus increasingly became general internal medicine – which I pursued during my postgraduate years in Aberdeen, Boston, Montreal and Jerusalem. When I first came to Toronto from Israel, where I lived for four years, it was for specialty training in nuclear medicine, which I realized very quickly was not for me. I decided to transfer back into internal medicine, but could not decide which specialty suited me best.

I struggled with the choice of career path. I recalled an invitation I had received from Dr. Abe Rapoport after a lecture he gave as a visiting professor at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. I attended the lecture during my last rotation at Shaare Zedek Hospital before moving to Toronto. He said, as we drove to Jerusalem, "If you ever have any questions when you get to Toronto, give me a call." I went to visit Dr. Rapoport, and after hearing of my interests, he suggested I consider geriatrics, which was not yet a recognized medical specialty in Canada. He added that Baycrest is a special place. I visited, applied for a training position that, when combined with my maternal grandmother's influence while I was growing up in Brooklyn, culminated in my accepting an offer of a conjoint appointment at Mt. Sinai Hospital and Baycrest. This was the beginning of my career in geriatric medicine.

Apple and Parsnip Soup with Coriander

3 tblsp unsalted butter
1 1/2 lbs. Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored, sliced
1 1/2 lbs. parsnips, peeled, sliced
1 lg onion, chopped
1 1/2 tsp ground coriander
4 c pareve chicken broth or vegetable broth

chopped fresh parsley — apple slices (optional)

Melt butter in heavy large pot over med.-high heat. Add apples, parsnips, onion & coriander and sauté until slightly softened, about 12 min. Add 4 c broth; bring to boil. Reduce heat to med.-low, cover, simmer until apples & parsnips are tender, about 40 min. Puree soup in blender in batches. Return puree to saucepan. Or use immersible blender right in pot. Thin with more broth if desired. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Ladle into bowls. Sprinkle with parsley; garnish with apple slices if desired and serve.

Lessons we can learn from cheating

Recently, we've been hearing a great deal about high-tech cheating. Students order term papers over the Internet. Others plagiarize by cutting and pasting from the Web without proper attribution. Text messaging goes on during exams using tiny and silent phones. Students sneak notes into electronic doodads that should be performing other functions.

Seymour Epstein

Aside from the fact that much of this technology is a bit beyond the ken of an older generation of teachers, the immoral aspects of this level of cheating are quite shocking. Yet, the response to most of this is to find technological barriers to such activity. Professors are provided with search engines that can uncover plagiarized text and off-the-rack term papers. Even custom-made papers written by pros can sometimes be revealed for what they are. Cellphones are being banned from exam rooms, which themselves are being taken off wireless local area computer networks. And on it goes.

These solutions are like the old ice-cream truck dilemma. When ice-cream trucks were found to cause accidents in suburban neighbourhoods, they were banned from many of them. The alternative would have been to teach children about proper and safe behaviour in busy streets, a lesson that would serve them well in many situations, not just in their ice cream years.

Do schools realize their responsibility in teaching values? Do we not possess an entire tradition that prohibits cheating as outright theft? Do we not have a famous talmudic dictum that tells us that the person who quotes his sources brings redemption to the world? Is the school reduced to policing after the fact when it should be transmitting age-old values that refine us, insert civility into our lives, and teach us to use our impressive new tools for good rather than evil?

Cheating leads to more of the same, and policing leads to punishment, but teaching the right way from the start can create a world of difference.

Of Mickey Rooney and my father's passing

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

It's been 17 years since my father, Shragah Phyvle Rosensweig, passed away. His yahrzeit is approaching, and my head is spinning with memories.

URBAN WRITER

I remember calling the hospital in Kitchener, Ont., on Oct. 27, 1989, at around 4 p.m., before Shabbat, to see how my father was feeling. He had been admitted two days before with a heart attack.

I recall the nurse telling me that the doctors were trying to keep him alive. For a second, denial kicked in, and I had the benefit of disbelief. The next second, I was was frantic. My heart dropped.

I recall asking the nurse what she was talking about. My father seemed fine when I saw him the day before. Life is strange that way, isn't it?

She was very compassionate and told me that my father's heart had stopped and they were trying to revive him. She could hear how anxious I was and told me to stay in Toronto, as it might be unsafe for me to drive. Nice of her.

I was scouting locations for a TV movie at the time, and remember trying to steady myself as I yelled something to the office manager about having to go. For some strange reason, I recall thinking it was too bad that I wouldn't be able to meet Mickey Rooney, the star of the movie. How odd it is that even in crisis, we maintain a certain composure, a strong sense of our needs and desires.

Driving home, during Friday rush hour on Highway 401, my mind jumped back and forth between knowing my dad was gone to having hope that he was still alive. Upon arriving in Kitchener, I remember driving straight to my parents' house and wondering where my mother was (may she live until 120), and how she was going to cope.

I drove up the street and saw my brother-in-law driving the other way. He stopped, looked at me with the saddest eyes and told me my mother was at the hospital. He may or may not have nodded his head. It was clear, though. My father was gone.

I drove to the hospital. I remember seeing my dear mother sitting with my father. She is a strong woman, and she held her Book of Tehillim in her hand as she kissed my father and said goodbye to him with such elegance and the greatest depth of love. I remember wondering whether I should take her home or let her be. I wasn't sure.

I recall how light from the street lamp shone through our living room window that Friday night as my mother reminisced about her childhood. As she talked about her home on Oxford Street right near the bottle factory, her face seemed to morph into what it had been in her childhood. It was an otherworldly vision. But I swear that it happened, and I know I was witness to something holy.

On Sunday, we flew to Israel. The next day, we buried my father in a cemetery outside Beit Shemesh, in the Jerusalem Hills. I recall the exquisite view and whispered in my head to my father how appropriate his resting place was – fit for a lover of Israel and the Jewish people.

Our personal history is based on our memories, and some reminders from others. The things we remember likely hold stronger messages and meaning for us than the stuff we forget.

From the time my dad passed away, I remember the hospital call, my brother-in-law's sad eyes, my mother kissing my father goodbye, the light from the street lamp shining on my mother's face that Friday night, the Jerusalem Hills and Mickey Rooney.

It's been 17 years, and although I'm sure that lots more happened around the time of my father's passing, for whatever reason, this is what I remember. This is my narrative.

PM stresses his support for Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In his first formal address to the Jewish community since being elected prime minister, Stephen Harper reinforced his strong support for Israel and its right to defend itself.

"When it comes to dealing with a war between Israel and a terrorist organization, this country and this government cannot and will never be neutral," Harper told B'nai Brith Canada's annual awards dinner last week, eliciting a standing ovation from more than 1,000 politicians, businesspeople and Jewish community leaders.

Stephen Harper

The Oct. 18 Award of Merit ceremony, held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto, was organized to pay tribute to Walter Arbib and Surjit Babra, the president and CEO, respectively, of the SkyLink Group of Companies for their contributions to Canadian society.

After thanking Arbib, who is Jewish, and his partner Babra, who is Sikh, for their philanthropy and hard work, Harper took the opportunity to assure the Jewish community that even in the face of harsh criticism from the opposition for calling Israel's response to Hezbollah's kidnapping of Israeli soldiers last July "measured," his government will continue to support Israel's fight against terror.

Harper refrained from labelling the Liberal party anti-Israel, which he did earlier this month in response to Liberal leadership candidate Michael Ignatieff's comments that Israel's strike on the Lebanese village of Qana during the conflict with Hezbollah was a war crime.

Supreme Court to hear agunah damages case

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — On Dec. 5, the Supreme Court of Canada will hear the appeal of a woman seeking damages from her ex-husband who withheld a get, or Jewish religious divorce, from her for 15 years.

In September 2005, the Quebec Court of Appeal overturned a precedent-setting ruling by a lower court that ordered Jessel (Jason) Marcovitz of Montreal to pay Stephanie Bruker damages of $47,500, plus interest going back to 1995, the year he granted her a get. The compensation was for her having been unable to remarry or have legitimate children according to traditional Judaism during those 15 years.

The appellate court upheld Marcovitz's appeal, despite the fact that he had signed an agreement with Bruker before they got married stating that he would go before a Montreal rabbinical court immediately upon issuance of a provisional decree of civil divorce, which occurred in 1980.

The case is significant because it will determine whether secular courts can adjudicate on breaches of promises of a religious nature when they're agreed to in a civil contract.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Activism Urged

TORONTO — The Canadian Islamic Congress wants Muslims to become politically active so they can "provide an alternative to the Jewish vote." Its Oct. 16 statement came as Liberal leadership candidate Michael Ignatieff faced criticism for calling Israel's July bombing of Qana in Lebanon a war crime. Noting Muslims outnumber Jews in Canada, the group said: "Canadian Muslims have the numbers to make a real and substantive difference" and should press for a "fair and balanced Canadian foreign policy."

Ignatieff Trip Put Off

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee has postponed a trip to Israel for MPs next month that would have included Liberal leadership candidate Michael Ignatieff, who faced controversy this month for calling Israel's bombing of the Lebanese town of Qana a war crime. The multi-party trip will take place in early 2007, after the Liberal leadership convention, and Ignatieff said he'll go. "It serves no one's purpose to undertake such an initiative in so highly charged a political environment," the CIC said. Ignatieff made his comment about Qana in French on a Radio-Canada talk show. He later said both Israel and Hezbollah may have committed war crimes in the war. Ignatieff, who accepted the CIC's invitation to go after making his war crime comments, said he's "disappointed" the trip is being postponed.

Journalist Backed Arts

TORONTO — Sid Adilman, a longtime Toronto Star entertainment columnist, died Oct. 14 in Toronto at 68 of heart failure. He had been ill with kidney problems. A strong booster of Canadian culture, Adilman was the Canadian editor of the entertainment paper Variety in the 1970s and '80s and the Star's entertainment editor from 1986 to 1991.

Star Publisher Resigns

TORONTO — Michael Goldbloom, the first Jewish publisher of the Toronto Star, Canada's largest newspaper, resigned last week after less than three years on the job. Joining Goldbloom was his hand-picked editor-in-chief, Giles Gherson. Their resignations came amid reports the pair were fired in a power struggle between the five families who control the Star's parent firm, Torstar, and its CEO, Robert Prichard, over Torstar's lacklustre performance. Goldbloom – the son of former Quebec MNA Victor Goldbloom – was publisher of the Montreal Gazette from 1994 to 2001.

Cotler Motion For Arar Apology Approved

OTTAWA — The House of Commons public safety committee last week approved a motion by Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler calling on the government of Canada to issue an official apology to Maher Arar and his family.

"The House of Commons has unanimously issued an apology to Maher Arar. RCMP Commissioner [Giuliano] Zaccardelli has apologized to Maher Arar. The government has acknowledged that a grave injustice has been done to Maher Arar. Mr. Arar has said that he awaits a formal government apology, and every day that passes without it is a source of continuing harm to him.The government should now do the right and honourable thing and apologize," said Cotler, who is the Liberal public safety critic and was Arar's lawyer before becaming justice minister in 2003.

The motion also calls on the government to negotiate compensation with Arar for "the ordeal of pain and suffering that he and his family endured." As well, it says Ottawa should voice its objection to the U.S. government for "its breach of domestic and international undertakings in the confinement and rendition" of Arar to Syria, and protest to the Syrian government for his torture while detained.

WORLD

Ex-camp Guard Freed

DETROIT — The United States freed an ex-Nazi concentration camp guard because it couldn't find a country to take him. Johann Leprich was released Oct. 16 because Romania, Hungary and Germany all refused to take him. Leprich, 81, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship this year for lying about his membership in the Nazi Waffen SS and being at Mauthausen when he came to the United States in 1958. The Detroit-area man is an ethnic German who was born in Romania.

Corrie Play Opens

NEW YORK — A play about a pro-Palestinian U.S. activist opened Oct. 15 in New York. My Name Is Rachel Corrie is a one-woman drama based on Corrie's journal and e-mails. Corrie, 23, was an activist with the International Solidarity Movement who was killed by an Israeli bulldozer as she tried to prevent it from searching for Palestinian arms-smuggling tunnels in Gaza in 2003. The play, which ran in London before coming to the Minetta Lane Theater in Manhattan, was set to open at another New York location last March but was delayed after concerns from the Jewish community.

Immigrant remembers the 1956 Hungarian Revolution

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nearly 50 years after her arrival here as a Hungarian immigrant, Erica Collins considers herself eminently fortunate to be a Canadian.

Feature

"Canada is wonderful," she said last week. "Canada is beautiful. I'm very grateful to be a Canadian."

Collins, 71, was among thousands of Hungarians who found a refuge in Canada after the 1956 Hungarian Revolution, a major event that overlapped with the eruption of the Suez war in the Middle East.

The revolution, which started as a spontaneous student demonstration in Budapest on Oct. 23, quickly escalated into a nation-wide revolt that challenged the primacy of Communism in Hungary.

As the situation spiralled out of control, Soviet tanks rumbled into Hungary on Nov. 4 to quell the pro-Western uprising. By Nov.10, the revolution had fizzled and Hungary was firmly back in the Soviet fold.

Two hundred thousand Hungarians, some of whom were Jewish, fled during and after the crisis. Canada accepted almost 40,000 Hungarian refugees, and Collins, a Holocaust survivor, was one of them.

She left Hungary because she had always wanted to live in a free, democratic and peaceful country. The chaotic conditions unleashed by the revolution enabled her to fulfil a lifelong dream.

When the revolution broke out, Collins was 21 years old and studying cosmetics. Although she supported the revolutionaries, she didn't take part in the demonstrations and street skirmishes that characterized the opening phase of the revolution, a flashpoint in the annals of modern Hungarian history.

"I could have done something," she recalled, "but I was scared. I didn't want to be killed. I wanted to escape to a beautiful country, like Canada."

From her window, however, Collins was able to spot Soviet soldiers and Hungarian protesters rushing to and fro.

She never believed that the revolution would succeed. "They had a few guns and no military training," she said of the revolutionaries. "The Soviet army was huge and powerful."

She likened the confrontation to a battle between an ant and an elephant.

Her father and mother, Leon and Bertha Nunes, sought to leave Hungary as well, never having forgotten the horrors and indignities they endured during the Nazi occupation of Hungary from 1944 to 1945.

A quick visit to Israel

(Written in Israel)

In late October, the waters of the Mediterranean are still very blue. Many Israelis awake with the first rays of dawn to walk or run at the edge of the waves of the water still calmly rolling in along the beige, brown and ochre coastline of this tiny country.

We tend to forget this October delight in central Canada as we ready ourselves for the last sparkling days of autumn, have the furnace cleaned and prepare for our mostly grey winter.

But the gentle stirring of a breezy Mediterranean morning along the Herzliya beach last week was not quite reflective of the country's existentially packed order of business that day, or indeed, on any day since it came into being some 58 years ago.

Israeli society is still in the aftermath of the 34 days of fighting against Hezbollah last summer. The task of literally, physically rebuilding the northern communities, homes and businesses that were devastated by the unceasing rain of Katyusha rockets is proceeding with great vigour.

But the task of rebuilding confidence in the leadership of the society's key institutions continues to lag. The eyes of the public are focused immovably, as if stuck with industrial glue, on accusations and allegations against the prime minister, the chief of staff, the minister of defence, the president and the former minister of justice, to name just the five most prominent in the news day's roll call.

The cumulative effect of the widely based institutional letdown, as it were – irrespective of the ultimate outcomes of the investigations, inquiries or trials – has been the emergence of a collective sense that there must be a kind of reinvestment in the civics, ethics and governance of decision making. Israel is a society looking for newer, more meaningful mechanisms of accountability.

Unfortunately, the gravity and unabating recurrence of so many other "problems" hardly leaves time to engage that reinvestment in the manner that most Israelis feel is necessary.

Thus, Israeli leaders must engage the issues even as the Israeli public strives to engage their leaders.

A cursory scan of the headlines from some of the daily newspapers on just one day last week – Sunday – tells a daunting tale of the types of issues that Israeli leaders must confront.

Yediot Achronot

• Europe and the UN intensifying pressure against Israel over reconnaissance flights into Lebanon.

• In spite of announcement by Israel that sorties would go on as long as Syria continues smuggling arms to Hezbollah: intense consultations at [Israeli Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert's Bureau aimed at UN compliance.

Ha'aretz

• Government to decide on Lieberman Proposal [The Lieberman proposal would change Israel's governance from a parliamentary to a presidential system.]

• In the wake of Qassams, cabinet to discuss a major operation in Gaza.

• [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad continues to threaten: Israel – a fading regime.

• Indonesia wants to buy Israeli unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs).

Hatsofeh

• German intelligence director dealing with release of soldiers abducted in Lebanon.

• Islamic Jihad: we will intensify rocket attacks on Negev.

A comparison is quite instructive. Thank God that Canada, a nation five times the size of Israel in population and 500 times its size in land mass, does not face the daily fare of existentially grave and emotionally wearying issues.

And we pray to God that Israel's leaders and its people, struggling at this moment, to find their way together again in mutual respect and trusting confidence, will always have the strength, wisdom and courage to contend with and overcome the many issues they face, however grave and wearying.

JNF BOXES, WRIT LARGE: The Jewish National Fund's traditional blue tzedakah box has been turned into colourful works of art by Israeli artists and displayed on Tel Aviv's Rothschild Boulevard. Artists such as renowned jewelry designer Michal Negrin, graffiti artist Rami Meiri, fashion designer Gadi Halperin, illustrators Uri Fink and Dani Karman, and painters and sculptors Zvi Geva and Zvika Lachman have personally signed one of the 4½-foot high boxes, which will eventually be sold at auction. Iran is Israel's biggest problem, says Silvan Shalom

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's greatest existential problem today revolves around Iran's quest to acquire nuclear arms, says Silvan Shalom, the former Israeli foreign minister.

"It's the most important issue we face," he said in an interview in Toronto last week. "Iran is an existential threat. Hamas can hurt us, but it can't undermine our existence, which Iran can do."

He added, "We can't live with the idea that Iran will possess a nuclear bomb."

Shalom, a Likud member of Knesset who served as foreign minister from 2003 until earlier this year, said he supports diplomatic means to resolve the problem.

Silvan Shalom

"We should work through diplomacy," said Shalom, who was here to attend a B'nai Brith banquet in honour of Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. "Iran is trying to buy time, but diplomacy should continue. Sanctions should be imposed on Iran. There are no more games to play."

Suggesting that the United Nations will eventually vote for sanctions, Shalom acknowledged that they may nevertheless be a hard sell.

"In one of my meetings with a very well-known European leader, he claimed that sanctions would increase the price of oil. But while he talked about the standard of living, I talked about the living," said Shalom, referring to Iran's opposition to Israel's existence.

Shalom twice declined to say whether he would back Israeli military action against Iran's nuclear facilities. "I wouldn't tell you anyway."

Declaring that there is now widespread recognition that Iran's campaign to be a nuclear power is not solely Israel's headache, Shalom said the current UN standoff with Iran shouldn't be portrayed as a confrontation between Jews and Muslims but as a test of wills between the Iranians and the international community.

Shalom urged Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, to dissolve the Hamas government, which was elected last January and which Israel has since boycotted.

"What need to be done now is for Abbas to exercise his authority. He has a right to do so."

Only then can Israel resume bilateral talks with the Palestinians, Shalom said. "Abbas is a good partner, certainly better than [the later PA president] Yasser Arafat. I've met [Abbas] a few times, and he's willing to find a solution, though he is not a Zionist and believes in the right of return."

Asked whether Israel should engage Hamas in negotiations, Shalom said, "Never! You can't talk to someone who wants to kill you."

There is no chance for peace as long as Hamas governs the Palestinian Authority, he asserted.

He expressed doubt that the 2003 UN-sanctioned "road map" peace plan can be revived. "It looks like it's dead," he said, blaming the Palestinians for failing to fulfil their obligations to combat terrorism.

He agreed that, under the road map, Israel is obliged to dismantle illegal outposts in the West Bank. "We should implement our commitments, but if the Palestinians aren't doing anything to carry out their obligations, it's ridiculous to ask us to make a move."

Shalom said that Israel should stand fast against Saudi Arabia's 2002 peace initiative.

"It's very troubling. It calls not only for a full withdrawal to the 1967 borders, but for the right of return. It spells out the destruction of Israel."

He advised Israel not to make further unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank. "It wouldn't be a smart move," he said, observing that Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza in 2005 has not inhibited Palestinian militants there from firing Qassam rockets at Israeli settlements and towns near the border.

New Encyclopedia Judaica has more Canadian entries

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The revised and updated second edition of the 16-volume Encyclopedia Judaica, scheduled to be published on Dec. 8, contains more information than ever before on Canada, says the executive editor.

"We have added a vast amount of material on Canada, Canadian Jewish figures, major Canadian cities and many prominent rabbis, thinkers, writers, artists, musicians and philosophers," said Michael Berenbaum in an interview last week.

"We have also taken pains to treat the Canadian part of the careers of major figures who spent some time in Canada."

Canadians who rate entries in the encyclopedia – a collaborative effort between Keter Publishing House and MacMillan Reference USA – run the gamut from Rosalie Silberman Abella, a Supreme Court justice, to Larry Zolf, a CBC broadcaster.

In addition, there are entries on such individuals as David Arnold Croll, the politician; David Cronenberg, the filmmaker; Jack Diamond, the architect; Benjamin Dunkelman, the war hero; Philip Givens, the former mayor of Toronto; Murray Koffler, the entrepreneur; Henry Kreisel, the novelist; Robert Lantos, the filmmaker; Michael Marrus, the historian; John Weinzweig, the composer; Heather Reisman, the bookstore chain owner; Joseph Salsberg, the trade unionist and politician; Reuben Slonim, the rabbi; and Wayne and Shuster, the comedians.

The second edition, with 22,000 signed entries on Jewish life, culture, history and religion and more than 150 new pages of colour inserts, is the encyclopedia's first makeover in some three decades.

The English edition, initially published in the early 1970s after 45 years of effort, was widely hailed as a reference work of great value.

Michael Berenbaum

Ten volumes of the original German edition, the brainchild of Zionist luminary Nahum Goldman, were published in Berlin in 1928. But due to the rise of the Nazis in 1933, the project was never completed.

Goldman revived the encyclopedia using German reparation funds. Work began in 1966 and was finally completed in 1972.

The second edition contains 2,664 fresh entries, said Berenbaum, a writer, lecturer, teacher and consultant who specializes in the development of museums and historical films.

There are new entries on subjects ranging from Chabad and the Camp David accords to Jewish law and Jewish women.

The newest entries also cover topics like medicine, Israeli prime ministers and presidents since Golda Meir and Zalman Shazar, the Yom Kippur War, Holocaust memorialization and Holocaust education.

More than 12,000 entries have been reworked, and they include subjects from the Bible and the Talmud to dietary laws and the Kabbalah.

As well, there is a new entry on the changing demography of New York, the city with the world's biggest Jewish population.

Each volume, with the exception of the index volume, features eight pages of colour inserts.

The hardcover set costs $1,995 (US), but an online edition is available to institutions.

In compiling the second edition, Berenbaum faced two major challenges.

"The most important was how to preserve the pristine authority of what is now a classic work of scholarship, while adding 40 years of history and intensive scholarship that has revamped our understanding of the past and our appreciation of its importance."

Fifty editors and 1,200 contributors laboured on the second edition.

"The core editorial staff of the Keter Publishing House in Jerusalem was small, but they borrowed liberally from the larger staff of MacMillan," said Berenbaum. "I used research assistants, my administrative assistant and consultants to keep track of and to supplement my work.

"We asked our writers to compose articles that would be both timely and timeless so they could be read in a decade or two and still be useful."

Apart from his chores at the encyclopedia, Berenbaum is currently the director of the Sigi Ziering Institute at the University of Judaism, where he is also an adjunct professor of theology.

As well, he was director of the United States Holocaust Research Institute and the president and chief executive officer of the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

Prior to that, he served as opinion page editor of the Washington Jewish Week.

Berenbaum's broad mandate was to work with the encyclopedia's editor-in-chief, Fred Skolnik, to recruit sectional editors and to oversee the North American sections.

The encyclopedia is not competing with the Internet, he said.

"Rather, we plan to use web technology to distribute the eBook version. The web only amplifies our ability to distribute this unique, highly valuable resource."

Weizmann launches alternative energy research project

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The world has no alternative but to wean itself off its dependence on oil, says an Israeli scientist who is heading up a new multidisciplinary research program aimed at finding alternative energy resources.

"Alternatives must be developed to non-sustainable fossil fuel," David Cahen of the Weizmann Institute of Science said in an e-mail interview.

"For that to happen, we need to give scientists optimal conditions for creativity, and we need to have sufficient patience," he added.

Cahen, a member of Weizmann's department of materials and interface, said certain projects may require 10 years or more. "There are no instant solutions. Sorry."

The Initiative for Research in Sustainable and Alternative Energy, which was launched this month, draws on the talents of some 250 scientists at the Weizmann Institute.

But the program is essentially the brainchild of a group of 12 scientists spearheaded by Cahen, Mordechai Sheves, Gad Galili, Jacob Karni, Yitzhak Maron and Ronnie Neumann.

World must wean itself from oil, says Israeli scientist

"We believe that others will want to be involved, and that new scientists joining the Weizmann Institute will be attracted to the program" said Cahen said.

The institute's president, Ilan Chet, said the current energy crisis forces institutions of higher learning to devise new means of generating energy.

But solutions can only be found through completely new technologies, he observed.

"We have an obligation to take the lead in the global effort in this field," Chet said. "We believe we can help shape the planet's future."

Sheves, the dean of Weizmann's faculty of chemistry, said the institute, given its forte for multidisciplinary scientific co-operation, is ideally placed to pursue such solutions.

The institute is not the only university-level institution conducting this kind of research.

"Obviously not," said Cahen. "The adage, 'The more, the better,' is relevant here because this has to be a global endeavour."

The institute's research program is relevant for a number of reasons.

Oil producers, particularly in the Arab and Muslim world, could affect the peace, security and stability of Israel and other nations, he said. As well, the demand for energy has escalated sharply as standards of living have risen and populations have expanded, especially in China and India.

Non-renewable energy sources are running out, and mounting oil prices threaten the global economy, Sheves added.

In addition, the burning of fossil fuels is a major source of air pollution and global warming.

In the face of these developments, the institute has already created some original approaches to the production of alternative energy.

But Cahen said he's not at liberty to discuss these projects as long as they're still subject to laboratory tests and have yet to pass peer review.

Cahen said the institute is not oriented toward "instant science."

As he explained: "Much of our research is basic. It may result in new ideas that can be converted to practical advances and new understandings of chemical, physical or organic processes, which may eventually lead to new technologies or even shifts in paradigm that might, in the future, change the way we live."

He added: "There is seldom a short, straight line between research of this type and practical application."

Asked how advanced Israel is in alternative energy research compared to Canada or the United States, he replied, "In terms of original non-fossil fuel-based work, Israel has some key advantages. But in terms of advanced fossil fuel-based technology developments, the larger economies, with a few notable exceptions, are more advanced."

Orthodox group promotes environmental awareness

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The environment may not be the leading sermon topic in synagogues around the world, but that could soon change if Canfei Nesharim, a New York-based, non-profit Orthodox environmental group, has its way.

Since 2003, the organization has been trying to promote understanding and encourage action regarding the relationship between Halachah and modern environmental issues.

Led by a worldwide board of halachic and environmental experts, Canfei Nesharim (which means "the wings of eagles") has set its sights on the Canadian Jewish Orthodox community, and by extension the Canadian Jewish community at large.

Toronto native Shai Spetgang is one of the group's founders and its lone Canadian board member. While completing his undergraduate degree in environmental studies at the University of Toronto, he became ba'al tshuvah and decided the time was right to bridge the gap between his academic pursuits and his religion.

Canfei Nesharim sets sights on Canadian Jewish community

"It was about connecting the current environmental crisis with my heritage," he said. "I was not seeing that in enough places or finding enough like-minded people in the Orthodox community. So I [helped] put an organization together."

Aside from his duties with Canfei Nesharim, he is also the manager of program development at the Ontario Environment Industry Association and the executive director of the Canadian Environmental Markets Association. Spetgang believes the group can have success in Canada, much as it has had in the United States, but he admits conditions here make it tougher.

"The number of Jews in a population centre will give Canfei Nesharim a critical mass," he said. "It has [been a challenge] in the Canadian community because it's not [Canadian Orthodox Jews'] first priority. They sometimes associate [us] as 'those crazy environmentalists.' But there are more Jews in the U.S. and therefore more Jews who are open to us."

Speaking by phone from her New York office, Evonne Marzouk, the group's executive director, said she's satisfied with the feedback she's received from the Jewish community so far.

"I can't speak for Canada, [but] I've been shocked at the lack of resistance we've had in the U.S.," she said. "We've gotten a really warm reception from a lot of people who wished someone would address the Orthodox community [about the environment] but were afraid to ask."

Canfei Nesharim has even managed to impress some of the major decision-makers in the Orthodox world. Both the Rabbinical Council of America and the Orthodox Union have responded positively to the group and have opened the door to promote it in congregations worldwide, Marzouk said.

The thrust of Canfei Nesharim's philosophy is found in the first few pages of its Compendium of Sources in Halachah and the Environment, the fledgling group's environmental reference point, which stresses verse 2:15 from the book of Genesis: "And the Lord God took the man and put him into the Garden of Eden to till and to keep (guard, protect) it."

It's a message the group wants the community to take to heart.

"The bottom line in the relationship between Halachah and the environment is that the sages wanted us to live by the Torah and live in the world so that it continues. This is evident in all the halachahs," Spetgang said.

The organization ramps up its educational activities twice a year, around Sukkot and around Tu b'Shvat. This year's Sukkot campaign revolved around water conservation. Pamphlets, as well as stickers and information packets, were handed out at local synagogues to promote the organization's presence in Canada.

Toronto resident and shul-goer Susan De Rosa was happy to discover the organization.

"As far as I know, there isn't another group that deals with environmental issues from an Orthodox perspective," she said. "When I saw that there was a group being proactive, doing research and providing tools for people in the Jewish community to work on and understand our relationship with the environment, I was really thrilled."

So thrilled, in fact, that she took it upon herself to distribute Canfei Nesharim's literature in her synagogue this past Sukkot.

"I gave them to the person who was doing the dvar Torah and they said, 'Wow. This is really interesting. Where did you get this?'"

It's the kind of positive reaction Spetgang hopes to hear more often from members of the Orthodox community. He believes they will eventually come around to the group's point of view.

"We can make the argument that Jews don't affect the world that much because we don't have a large population and don't draw on so many resources," he said. "But the truth is that we do affect the world, and we have to serve as a light unto the nations."

Canfei Nesharim is planning a major education campaign for the fall of 2007, along with a revamp of its website. For more information about Canfei Nesharim, visit www.canfeinesharim.org.

REBUILDING LIVES IN NORTHERN ISRAEL

A Financial Report

From the very beginning of Israel's war for national security against Hezbollah, contributions from Toronto's Jewish community and other friends of Israel provided urgent, immediate relief. In fact, the first emergency funds to arrive in northern Israel when the war began came from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's incredibly generous donors. Thanks to our community's ongoing generosity, crucial allocations continue through UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007. Together we are helping 110,000 children who experienced rocket attacks, providing temporary housing for the displaced, offering small business loans to those who lost their livelihoods and re-equipping critical community facilities.

Thanks to the immediate support of our donors, UJA Federation has already sent 10 million emergency CASH dollars to Israel. Some of these funds were distributed in the first days of the war. Here's a breakdown, to date, of the initial cash transfers:

- Recreation, relief and respite for citizens throughout northern communities affected by the war $693,182
- New equipment and facilities for schools in Kiryat Shmona, Acco and Nahariya to assist students during the war $681,818
- Arranging summer camps, away from the north for children and parents, including transportation and facilities during the war $646,269
- Equipping bomb shelters and supplying emergency amenities for northern residents under fire $556,766
- Emergency food relief during the war $426,578
- Emergency response equipment provided during the rocket attacks $330,000
- Emergency facility repairs $67,233
- Direct trauma services $60,000
- Funds awaiting distribution for general emergency needs $6,538,154

- Total $10,000,000

The 34 day war took a tragic toll on northern Israel with over 4,000 terrorist rockets. The requirements are urgent and the emergency is far from over. Much more needs to be done.

Lethal intentions of obscene rhetoric

The last Friday of the Muslim holiday of Ramadan was celebrated last week in Tehran as Al Quds day, as it has been since the decree of the late Ayataollah Khomeini and in some other capitals of the Muslim world. It was a rather large showering of undiluted hatred for Israel and the Jewish people. We have heard it before. Alas, we will undoubtedly hear it again. The Jews have no claim, let alone any right to Jerusalem, the Tehrani celebrants chanted. The Jews therefore have no claim, let alone any right to a sovereign state of their own in the Middle East.

Speaking before thousands of robustly cheering demonstrators in Tehran and to countless more Iranians by television, Iran's president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shouted: "This regime [Israel] has no reason to exist... You should believe that this regime is disappearing."

Ahmadinejad's frothy orations were also directed at the countries of the West. "It's in your own interest to distance yourself from these criminals [Israel]... this is an ultimatum. Don't complain tomorrow. Nations will take revenge [upon you]."

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres correctly compared Ahmadinejad's statements and threats to those made some 70 years ago by Adolf Hitler. Thus, Peres urged that an international coalition of staunch allies must arise to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons. There is no reason to doubt the sincerity of Ahmadinejad's lethal intentions. There is no reason to make light of his obscene rhetoric. The world paid a very grave price when it doubted Hitler's rabid, hate-infested intentions.

But where is this international coalition to be found? The governments of France and Russia have already rushed to announce they will oppose even limited sanctions against Iran and its nuclear program when the subject comes before the Security Council.

The civilized world would do well to heed the words spoken last week by Canada's own prime minister, Stephen Harper.

"It is too easy to ignore the greater implications of that truth – [that there is one simple reason for seeking the destruction of the Jews: because the Jews are different] which became so evident in World War II, that those who seek to destroy the Jews, who seek to destroy Israel, will for the same reason ultimately seek to destroy us all.

"The world was too slow to fully grasp the threat of fascism, too willing in the early years [before World War II] to make excuses for it, too blind to see what it meant for all of us."

Ahmadinejad has made plain his evil intention for the Jewish state, and, as Harper has forewarned, to "all of us" as well. Will the world be too slow today, in the year 2006, to fully grasp the threat? Is the civilized world too blind to see?

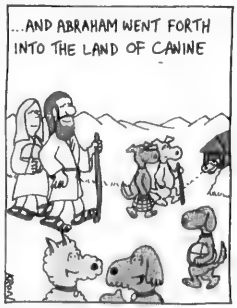
French Auschwitz transports (1)

The article "Canadians seek French redress for Auschwitz transports" (CJN, Oct. 5, 2006) is most appropriate and a reminder to everyone of the duplicity of the French Vichy government and the Société Nationale Des Chemins De Fer Français (SNCF) during the calamitous occupation of France by German troops.



I am a former native of Paris, France, who, together with my younger sister, miraculously survived the atrocities and crimes committed against Jews during those unforgettable years. But during that same period, we lost our parents and a younger brother in the Holocaust.

Our father was interned on May 14, 1941, at Beaune-La-Rolande and deported to Auschwitz on June 27, 1942. Our mother was interned on July 16, 1942, at Pithiviers, and deported from Drancy on Aug. 26, 1942, and our brother was also interned on July 16, 1942, at Pithiviers, and deported from Drancy on Aug. 22, 1942. Both were deported to Auschwitz.

French Auschwitz transports (2)

On Dec. 7, 1943, my father was deported by train on Transport No. 64 from Drancy, France to Auschwitz. He perished there. From March 1942 to July 1944, the Vichy France government collaborated fully with the Gestapo by rounding up some 75,000 Jews and deporting them to Auschwitz. Each numbered train transport carried some 1,000 Jews. Only some 2,500 Jews survived.

Five thousand Jews died of malnutrition and disease in internment camps under the control of the Vichy government. This is the bloody legacy left by the French Vichy government.

The surviving victims and heirs have taken legal action for compensation not only against the Société Nationale Des Chemins De Fer Français (SNCF) but also against the state of France.

While the SNCF is appealing this legal action, the state of France has not appealed this action. The state of France would not dare to do so. The state of France should stand up and be counted to fulfil its moral obligation to the victims and their heirs.

Modern Orthodox manifesto (1)

While there is much to be gained by the effort to distil the ideological, social, and political underpinnings of any group or sub-group in Judaism, elements of Martin Lockshin's article left me uneasy ("A modern Orthodox manifesto," CJN, Oct. 5).

The very idea of a list of requirements, even when accompanied by the caveat it "is not the only one possible," is dangerously close to denying the rich diversity of opinion that exists within modern Orthodoxy. Whether on issues relating to women or engagement with non-Orthodox groups, there is nothing close to a consensus within modern Orthodoxy.

The difficulty of finding consistency within modern Orthodoxy is demonstrated by Lockshin's own thesis. While mourning the demise of the Rabbinical Council of America in Toronto (which was overwhelmingly made up of Yeshiva University graduates), he praises the graduates of Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, none of whom have been permitted to join the Rabbinical Council of America. Additionally, in what can only be considered a startling lacuna, Lockshin managed to write a full-page article on modern Orthodoxy with nary a reference to Yeshiva University.

While many of the issues raised by Lockshin are eminently reasonable, his descent into stereotyping is painful. When he writes that "modern Orthodox Jews see it as religious duty to pay taxes," the implication is unavoidable. The idea that haredim are, as a group, less than ethical is one that should not find refuge in civil discourse. No group has a monopoly on ethics, and, tragically, ethical shortcomings are spread quite evenly across the Jewish world.

As most reasonable people by now realize, a group's success is undermined by an excessive focus on the negative. If modern Orthodoxy is going to be characterized by its bitterness toward haredim, there is very little reason for optimism. For modern Orthodoxy to grow, it needs to focus on its strengths. Modern Orthodoxy will not be saved through the tearing down of others or the production of artificial catechisms.

Modern Orthodox manifesto (2)

"A modern Orthodox manifesto" is a wonderful summation of modern Orthodoxy. But Martin Lockshin's need to publish it points out a major sociological flaw in modern Orthodoxy. For the vast majority of the Jewish world, including the modern non-Orthodox and modern near-Orthodox (and except, perhaps, for the extreme secularists), modern Orthodoxy is a valid, authentic and much-loved and respected part of the mosaic. The people to whom he is trying to explain himself are the pre-modern Orthodox. They will never accept him or his teachings. It's time for modern Orthodoxy to look toward those who respect it, and love it, rather than to continue banging its head against the medieval ghetto wall, begging to be let in.

Lawyers without rights

By SAMUEL SIMMONS and HOWARD SIMMONS

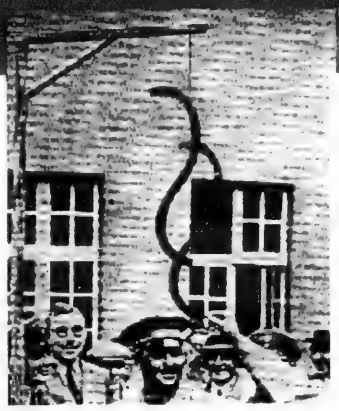
When the Nazis came to power on Jan. 30, 1933, there was a well-established legal system in Germany, with an honest and capable judiciary and an independent bar. Yet in a period of just months, an apparently strong and established legal system cracked under pressure and then collapsed in a few short years.

At that time, more than 50 per cent of Berlin lawyers and about 30 per cent of all German lawyers were Jewish. Jews also made up about 23 per cent of the law professors and seven per cent of the judges. It was not unusual for fathers to hand over law offices to sons on retirement. There were few daughters who were lawyers, as women started to become lawyers only in the early 1920s. By 1933, of the 35 women lawyers in Berlin, 20 were Jewish.

There was a "joke" circulating at this time in Germany: when a student in first grade was asked to name the 12 apostles, he replied, Judah, Levi, Benjamin, Ephraim, etc. The teacher told the student he was wrong and asked where he got those names from. Another student replied that he had given the names of the lawyers at the regional court. This "joke" shows the tension then existing between Jews and non-Jews and hints at deep resentment among Germans over the number of Jewish lawyers in the country. The Nazis used this resentment to their advantage.

At a meeting of the League of National-Socialist German Jurists (the Nazi lawyers association) early in March 1933, one speaker demanded that no lawyer, notary or judge who was Jewish should be allowed to practise. There followed thunderous applause. Shortly after that, the Nazis organized rallies advocating the elimination of Jewish Germans in the legal profession. At the end of March, the minister of justice for the state of Prussia issued a directive to the presidents of the supreme courts of the various states that Jewish judges were to resign immediately. At the Justice building in Munich, there was an announcement that it was necessary to "safeguard the prestige of the administration of justice," and the Justice Building was to become off limits to Jewish lawyers starting April 1, 1933. At this point, no laws had yet been passed against Jews practising law, and the directives had no legal effect.

To achieve formal legality, the goverrnment passed a law on April 7, 1933, taking away the right of German Jewish lawyers to practise law or be judges. Exceptions to this law were made for German Jews who had been front line soldiers in the German army in World War I, for those who had lost sons or fathers in this war or had been lawyers since 1914. Following this, approximately 25 per cent of the German Jewish lawyers lost their right to practise, a number that was much lower than the Nazis had hoped or imagined, as they did not realize the extent to which German Jews had fought with Germany in World War I.



What did the German lawyers, judges and the bar associations (the governing bodies of lawyers) do when the Jewish lawyers and the legal system itself were under attack? There was no display of solidarity by the non-Jewish lawyers in opposing the disbarment of their colleagues. There was silent pity, but seldom any active assistance. While some lawyers behaved "decently," as one affected lawyer described it, many others used the situation to their advantage.

In 1933, the severe economic depression greatly reduced the income of all lawyers. The remaining lawyers benefited from the sudden drop in the number of lawyers. Lawyers were abandoned by their partners. Judges were not protected by their fellow judges. Ironically, it was clients of Jewish lawyers who most often came to their defence. Most clients were not interested in making a political statement, but just wanted to have a capable lawyer handle their affairs. But with the threats being made against the Jewish lawyers and the increasing difficulties those lawyers were facing, many clients gradually moved to non-Jewish lawyers. Some wrote to the minister of justice asking for an exception for their own lawyer, but these were ultimately small cries in the plea for justice.

To carry out the policy of removing the judges, the Nazi government needed the cooperation of the bar associations. The Berlin Bar Association decided on May 23, 1933, that Jewish and non-Jewish lawyers were no longer to set up law partnerships. This was not even a requirement of the law, but the Berlin Bar Association went beyond the law to further restrict Jewish lawyers. In June 1933, the Berlin Bar Association decreed that every lawyer now had to produce proof of Aryan descent, thus excluding Jewish lawyers.

By this decree, the Berlin Bar Association was carrying out the Nazi policy of identifying who was Jewish. If a lawyer was Jewish and if he claimed that he fought in World War I and was exempt, then this lawyer was required to produce strict proof of his exemption. For example, if a lawyer claimed that he was exempt because he had been a front line soldier in World War I, he had to prove which battles he had fought in. If a lawyer was in the army but did not fight on the front lines, he did not qualify for the exemption. The Jewish lawyers who still remained lost any illusions about the policy of their professional organization, and no longer expected any assistance from it.

Although no Jewish woman lawyer fit the exemption, the Nazi government was faced with a dilemma. Hanna Katz was a female Jewish lawyer who, under the restrictions, would have been disbarred. However, she was the only German member of the Trade Mark Committee of the International Law Association. If she were disbarred, Germany would lose its seat on this committee. An exception was made for her to remain as a lawyer, albeit temporarily.

There are many examples of ways that judges did not try to help their fellow judges or lawyers. Criminal lawyers often depended on legal aid for their clients. Judges in courts often had the authority to direct which lawyer would get a case. Many judges stopped referring these clients to Jewish lawyers. This, for many lawyers, was financially crippling.

Hermann Lehmann, who had been a lawyer for five years, lost his right to practise law. He had worked for one judge as a trainee and recollects, "As a lawyer, I had pleaded before his court and we knew each other well. I met him in the morning and greeted him respectfully, he being the senior. He recognized me immediately. He looked through me as if I were air and did not return my greeting. It painfully dawned on me how deeply I must have already sunk in the appreciation of my fellow beings."

Many of the remaining Jewish lawyers and judges could not believe, after these losses of civil rights and self-dignity, and after so many had lost their profession and the remaining ones so much of their livelihood, that anything could get worse. However, after the Nuremberg Party Rally in 1935, the 232 remaining Jewish judges and prosecutors were removed. After Kristallnacht in November 1938, the law disbarred any remaining Jewish lawyers. The only minor concession was that some of these former lawyers could apply to be "consultants," where the former lawyer could represent only Jews. They were not allowed to call themselves lawyers. Hanna Katz, the only remaining Jewish female lawyer was also disbarred, but succeeded in becoming a consultant. She was fortunate in being able to leave Germany for the United States in June 1941. Thanks to the fact that she spoke English, she succeeded faster than others, and soon became a lawyer in New York State.

When the attacks on the Jewish lawyers and judges in Germany began, many thought these were merely Nazi excesses and were not taken seriously. Many thought these extreme actions would pass. It was only in retrospect that we can pinpoint that these excesses marked the complete collapse of the legal structure. As terrifying as the boycotts, acts of violence and laws eventually were, it was the willing or tacit acceptance of these policies by lawyers, judges and the legal system that is most frightening. These actions, and inactions, are what not only sealed the fate of German Jewish jurists, but saw the complete dismantling of the rule of law in Germany.

To remember these German Jewish lawyers, not just the famous ones, the German Federal Bar, the Israel Bar Association and others are providing an Exhibit titled "Lawyers Without Rights". The exhibit will be in Toronto from Nov. 1 to 12, at Beth Tzedec Congregation, 1700 Bathurst Street.

Opinions

Demography before Halachah

A man who lives in Europe wrote to me recently. He had read one of my books and wanted some clarification. He had a very Jewish-sounding surname, but he was quick to note that, like his mother, he was not Jewish – but his paternal grandfather had been the chief rabbi of his native country.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

That is one of the many burdens of Diaspora existence in our time. Even a rabbi may not have what it takes to make sure his grandchildren stay Jewish. We all know Jews, sometimes pillars of the community, whose offspring have married out. Unless we take drastic steps to help children to stay in, they will be lost to Judaism forever.

I believe that all Jews should have the freedom to determine the level of their personal observance. That makes me a liberal Jew. However, in matters of Jewish status, when I was a congregational rabbi, I insisted that all streams in Judaism should follow the traditional criteria and only accept as Jewish those people who were born to Jewish mothers or converted to Judaism.

Hence my opposition to patrilineal descent, which means granting Jewish status to children of Jewish men married to non-Jewish women on an equal footing with the traditional recognition of children of Jewish women married to non-Jewish men.

But experiences of the kind reflected in the story of the rabbi's grandson prompt me to revise my traditionalist bent. Also, I have seen the splendid results in many congregations, not least in Europe, that have been soft on the law, but firm on integration. Many children of mixed marriages who otherwise might have been lost to Judaism are now active members of Jewish communities and are raising Jewish children, because rabbis and congregations put people before principles – liberal Judaism at its best.

Individuals thus integrated are understandably distressed when they are not accepted as Jews. I now believe that, despite halachic "irregularities," it behooves us all to honour and celebrate their commitment, not to try to disenfranchise them.

A passage in the Talmud chooses to misread the verse in Psalm 119, "It is time to act for the Lord, for they have violated Your Teaching." It interprets it to mean that there are situations when, to be true to our heritage, we must violate the Teaching in order to act for God. There may be times, paradoxically, when going against an ordinance in the Torah may help save it.

Perhaps now is such a time. As there can be no Judaism without a critical mass, it may be our task to integrate as many Jews "of questionable status" as possible into our communities. The alternative may keep us halachically intact, but it will make us demographically depleted.

The idiots have inherited the earth

When I recently walked past a group of students who were involved in a heated discussion, I thought to myself that one of two things was going on. The first was that these people were intelligent, focused individuals debating a weighty topic such as global warming or international politics with gusto. The second – and, sadly as it turned out, correct – possibility was that they were arguing about which stunt was best in the movie Jackass 2.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

For those of you who live in a cave and are thus unfamiliar with Jackass I, I will explain its simple formula: take a bunch of people who lack common sense, give them a camera and a task that will likely hurt them (such as playing with weapons or fire), and collect the tape when the smoke has cleared. It's all about idiots doing idiotic things.

It's symptomatic of our times. Our celebrities are celebrated simply because they're celebrities. There's no longer any achievement required, except being in the spotlight for a short amount of time. They don't have to be admired or worthy of praise, they need only be known for something. In Yiddish, they call it shtick – an act or gimmick that a person is known for. It could be that they're crazy, angry or bitter; that they have an X-rated video circulating on the Internet; that they perform suicidal stunts; or that they've built an airport in their house. Tons of newsprint and hours of TV are wasted on the personal lives of people who are famous just for being famous.

But the newest celebrities are people who can be convinced to do dumb things. The latest video of some kid breaking his bones skateboarding inevitably hits the Web and is seen by 100 million people before it fades away to that secret place where forgotten fads go. We watch as people set themselves up to be terribly hurt by, say, motorized shopping carts or dynamite-powered vehicles, and we are fascinated. We want to yell, "You idiots! That's a train!" or, "That looks like it's going to be painful." But instead, we stare at the screen as the next potential celebrity decides to light himself on fire while bungee jumping over a pool filled with alligators.

People, for the most part, have lost the "this is a bad idea" instinct. Warning labels try to point out the most obvious of possible stupid activities, such as not eating paint or sticking your fingers in electrical sockets, but there's only so much room on a label to cover every possible dumb idea. An idiot will always find new and exciting ways to hurt himself. When you have so many people with so little common sense, someone is bound to stick something where it doesn't belong. And since personal responsibility died with common sense, if you haven't been warned that something is going to hurt, it's obviously not your fault.

But don't think that it's only everyday people who lack common sense. Politicians are also prone to this condition. Take, for example, a recent incident in international politics. North Korea, a nation whose main industry is consuming international aid, has decided it can fix all of its ills with nuclear weapons. It doesn't matter that the country has no food or industry. In response to North Korea's recent nuclear weapons test, the United Nations, which is similarly populated by people lacking in common sense, issued North Korea a strongly worded warning and restricted the trade of luxury goods with the Communist dictatorship.

Are you trying to destabilize the planet? Are you developing weapons that can end the world? Here's an angry letter. And let that be a lesson to the rest of you.

Yes, the idiots have inherited the earth. They've somehow escaped the process of natural selection and come out on top. Lawsuits are now the norm, warning labels continue to grow larger and contain ever-smaller text, and instead of action, we get angry letters.

We glorify people who propagate idiocy, and they're the topic of discussion in our esteemed halls of learning. We stare at them as they barrel toward disaster. We're frozen and fascinated, like deer in headlights.

We're circling the drain, picking up speed, and blissfully ignorant about it. But the important thing is that there's no warning label, so we're not responsible for the outcome.

Juggling my different roles

It's always with a twinge of guilt that I feel a sense of relief at the end of the month-long frenzy that is our holiday season.

Are holidays really supposed to be this much work? My non-Jewish friends are always surprised at both the length and nature of our fall holiday season, which is not limited to one concentrated time, but is a month-long journey that seems to constantly shift between holy and normal days.

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

For me, the real trial of the season is not the amount of time it takes up, but the fact I feel compelled to live in two different realms at once. Indeed, I often feel that being a Jewish student in Halifax has required me to become a schizophrenic of sorts, and the feeling is most intense during the holiday season, which inevitably falls during a very busy time in the semester.

During my first year in university, my dorm mates were fascinated by the concept of Shabbat. They thought it was Cinderella-like magic how every Friday evening at sundown, I would turn into a "shomer shabbes pumpkin," suddenly not allowed to use electricity or do any work. And I was equally fascinated by how, on Shabbat, I could share the same space with them, yet have such a different experience of that space.

For me, the 25 hours of Shabbat were a time of relaxation and rest, while for my dorm mates, it was business as usual. They eventually got used to my special day and came to accept it as part of the routine. They would stop giving me funny looks when I said I wouldn't be working on my papers, and I gained a healthy supply of "Shabbes goys," ready to serve at any moment.

Shabbat also provided tasty fruit for discussions about how every person seems to have a different experience of time and space, depending on what he or she brings to them. Sometimes, like on holidays or birthdays, we're conscious of giving a certain day special significance. But sometimes we're unaware of it, like when we experience things differently depending on our mood. I know that when I'm happy, everything seems beautiful and wonderful, even the rain, which normally bothers me. But when I'm in a bad mood, the rain can be the object of my resentment. Perhaps, my friends and I contemplated, our experience of time and space depends only on how we decide to fill it.

The holiday season changes the weekly cycle and Shabbat's place in it. With holy days coming almost one on top of the other, the season brings home to me the difficulty of playing different roles and the impossibility of satisfying all of their demands completely. I often wonder whether I'm a student first or a Jew? Why must I choose between going to important classes and going to shul?

I have a feeling I'm not alone in these musings and that this is one of the great challenges of living Jewishly in a predominantly non-Jewish culture. And I'm sure this feeling is shared by anyone who lives a hyphenated existence. Whether you're a Jewish-Canadian or some other combination, you're inherently different from the norm and must juggle the various roles you play.

But I've also come to realize that I can't think of anyone who is able to focus on just one role. I have one professor who comes to class exhausted every morning because her baby twins keep her up all night. I see how she struggles with being both a mother and a teacher (and likely with other roles as well).

I suppose that we all live a hyphenated existence of sorts, lacking sufficient time to be the perfect anything – student, Jew, parent or friend. But this is something we must all contend with, and perhaps we should even be happy that our lives are so full that we're pulled in so many different directions. I guess that's what I've learned from this holiday season.

Jaffa and Tel Aviv coexisted uneasily

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Amalgamated in 1949, Tel Aviv and Jaffa are now administratively one seamless city. But for virtually 40 years, from the founding of Tel Aviv in 1909 to the War of Independence in 1948, the year Israel declared statehood, these neighbouring municipalities coexisted uneasily.

Tel Aviv, which means "hill of spring" in Hebrew, began as a garden suburb for Jewish residents of Jaffa. But as the Zionist movement and Palestinian nationalism clashed with increasing frequency, Tel Aviv became a symbol of the rebirth of the Jewish people in their ancestral homeland.

The relationship between Tel Aviv and Jaffa is the subject of Mark LeVine's Overthrowing Geography: Jaffa, Tel Aviv and the Struggle for Palestine 1880-1948 (University of California Press).

In writing this intriguing book, LeVine – a professor of modern Middle Eastern history, culture and Islamic studies at the University of California – made use of Jewish and Arab primary sources.

His research has served him well, for in this volume, he shatters the assumption that Jaffa was home to few Jews, even as late as the 1940s, and dispels the notion that Jaffa's Jewish and Arab elites did not co-operate to solve common problems.

Jaffa, the most important port in Palestine and the Palestinians' cultural capital until Israel's emergence as a sovereign state, has repeatedly changed hands.

Conquered by the ancient Egyptians, Jaffa came under the sway of the Israelites during the biblical period. The cedars of Lebanon, used in the building of Solomon's Temple, were unloaded in Jaffa and shipped to Jerusalem.

Falling to the Muslims in 639, Jaffa was seized by the Crusaders in 1099, only to revert to Muslim hegemony in 1196.

In the wake of the Mamluk era (1268-1517), Jaffa was taken over by the Ottoman Turks, who held it in their grasp until the early 20th-century British conquest.

With the end of the Crimean War in the late 1850s, Jaffa's economic importance increased. Its exports included wheat, cotton and, of course, oranges. Its imports ran the gamut from British fabrics to Egyptian rice.

By the 1870s, Jaffa was a cosmopolitan Mediterranean town, with oranges having replaced cotton as Palestine's most important export crop. Indeed, the export of oranges jumped from 165,000 cases in 1885 to 1.6 million in 1913. Encouraged by the demand, farmers in and around Jaffa expanded their citrus groves.

Jaffa also became the chief debarkation point for European tourists visiting Palestine.

On the eve of World War I, Jaffa was the most important port in the eastern Mediterrancan after Istanbul, Beirut and Alexandria, its volume of trade having tripled since the 1880s.

Sephardi Jews, followed by Ashkenazim, came to Jaffa in the 1820s and 1830s, revitalizing its Jewish community, which played a pivotal role in Jaffa's development.

David Smilansky, one of the founders of Tel Aviv, claimed that Muslim and Christian traders had a stranglehold on the local economy. But a Syrian journalist wrote that "most of the commerce is in Jewish hands, as if entering a Jewish city."

The high proportion of Jews in such Jaffa neighborhoods as Shapira, Givat Herzl and Florentin was a source of concern to Palestinian nationalists. In 1907, a Palestinian notable warned that "a foreign foundation is now conquering the Jaffa region" and threatening "the future" of Palestine.

On March 16, 1908, the day before Purim, fighting broke out between Jewish and Muslim youths. Thirteen Jews and one Muslim were injured in the melee. The British consul in Jaffa ascribed the tension to Arab bitterness over the explosive growth of the Jewish population.

In 1866, 150 Jews resided in Jaffa, compared to 3,850 Muslims and 1,000 Christians. A year before David Ben-Gurion arrived in Jaffa in 1905 as a new immigrant, 3,000 Jews, 18,000 Muslims and 9,000 Christians lived in Jaffa. By 1913, more than one quarter of Jaffa's population of 50,000 consisted of Jews.

As Palestinian opposition to Zionism grew exponentially, Arab-Jewish clashes became commonplace. Street fighting erupted in 1920 and again in 1921 and 1929. As a result, hundreds of Jews fled to Tel Aviv, the first Hebrew city in the modern epoch.

Ground was broken for Tel Aviv on April 11, 1909 on a plot of sandy land known as Karm al-Jabali. According to LeVine, the Ahuzat Bayit society, whose members founded Tel Aviv, had no intention of establishing a separate city but of building a green and pleasant suburb for which Jaffa would continue to provide essential services.

Tel Aviv, in fact, was not Jaffa's first suburb. Taking their cue from well-off Muslims and Christians who had fled the filth and noise of the old city, Jews from Jaffa built the first Jewish suburb, Neve Tzedek, in 1887.

Neve Tzedek inspired further suburbs: Neve Shalom in 1890, Mahane Yosef in1904, Kerem Hateimanim in 1905 and Ohel Moshe just a year later.

In 1906, 60 prominent members of Jaffa's Jewish community established an organization to purchase land and construct homes outside Jaffa.

These pioneers had two goals: to develop a Zionist community where Jews could nurture their national, linguistic and cultural values, and to stem the flow of Jewish capital into the Arab sector (some Jews in Jaffa rented homes from Arab landlords).

Tel Aviv in 1937

The chairman of Ahuzat Bayit, Akiva Weiss, explained in a prospectus that he wanted to create a clean, modern city in Tel Aviv. Architects from Germany and what is now Austria were asked to draw up plans.

The commission was offered to a Viennese architect, Wilhelm Stiasni. "In contrast to the earlier Jewish neighbourhoods of Jaffa," LeVine observes, "Stiasni's plan and Ahuzat Bayit's bylaws limited the number of houses that could be built and provided for the allocation of ample open space and public and private gardens."

From 1910 to 1914, Jews from various Zionist societies bought much of the land surrounding present-day Tel Aviv. Their intention was to merge all the plots into one Jewish quarter, which would be known as Tel Aviv.

Britain conquered Jaffa on Nov. 16, 1917, but from March 28, 1916 until the British invasion, almost all the Jews of Tel Aviv were expelled by the Turks.

During the 1920s, the population of Tel Aviv and Jaffa grew by leaps and bounds. By 1944, nearly 75 per cent of the residents in the Tel Aviv-Jaffa area were Jewish.

Often referred to as the White City, due to the colour of many of its International and Bauhaus-style buildings, Tel Aviv became the hub of the Yishuv, the Jewish community of Palestine.

Although Zionism was clearly at odds with Palestinian nationalism, Jewish and Arab leaders in Tel Aviv and Jaffa managed to work together on a variety of joint projects.

They devised a system for the collection and division of taxes, the paving and/or expansion of roads in border neighbourhoods, the administration of common slaughterhouses and the improvement of transportation from Jaffa-Tel Aviv to Haifa.

As well, they co-operated in the construction of a train station that would benefit both towns.

Nevertheless, there was political tension in the air, which was best summed up by Meir Dizengoff, the legendary mayor of Tel Aviv: "It cannot be denied that a kind of a state of war exists between the Jews and our Arab neighbours."

Due to the 1936 Arab Revolt – the first Palestinian uprising – and the closure of Jaffa's harbour, the city fathers of Tel Aviv decided to build their own port.

As tensions escalated after World War II, Jews ultimately found it too difficult to live in Jaffa among their Arab neighbours. By 1946, for example, almost 7,000 Jews from the Manshiyyeh quarter had moved to Tel Aviv, complaining of a lack of security.

Jaffa was earmarked for the Arab state envisaged by the United Nations under its 1947 Palestine partition scheme. But on May 13, 1948, Jaffa surrendered to Jewish forces, prompting all but 3,500 of its Arab inhabitants to flee.

When the War of Independence officially ended in 1949, all of the 26 Palestinian villages in the Jaffa sub-district had already been emptied or destroyed.

Jewish immigrants, mainly from Bulgaria, were resettled in abandoned Arab properties in Jaffa.

As of a few years ago,15,800 Arabs resided in Jaffa, representing 4.5 per cent of its total population.

The city once lyrically extolled by Arab writers as the Bride of the Sea is but a memory today.

New director of Holocaust Centre compelled by Shoah

Jennifer Ritter returns to Toronto after successful stint in Florida

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

So, why does a successful attorney give up the legal life to devote herself to teaching the lessons of the Holocaust? In the case of Jennifer Ritter, the new director of the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, the lessons of the Shoah are simply too compelling to pass up.

"I've always had a fascination with Jewish history and, in particular, the Shoah," says Ritter, a Toronto native who returns home after a successful five-year stint as executive director of The Holocaust Memorial Resource and Education Center of Florida.

"As a watershed event in our history, as well as all humanity, the Holocaust has always intrigued me. There is just so much to be learned from that period. When you look at what's going on around the world today - the genocide, the rise in antisemitism in the Islamic world - you see warning signals. And, in a multi-cultural society like Canada, where we're supposed to be championing the values of diversity, respect and tolerance, we need to learn those lessons."

Jennifer Ritter

Another motivating factor Ritter cites for her chosen line of work is clear each time she looks into the eyes of her one-year-old son, Jacob.

"This beautiful little boy simply wouldn't be here today had my husband Matthew's grandparents not survived hiding in Czechoslovakia," she says. "Jacob is fourth generation and that is truly amazing to me, as is our very history; how we survived and how we thrived despite the odds. That's why I do what I do."

While Florida was a great experience for Ritter, both she and her Ottawa-born husband, a pilot with Air Canada, knew it was just a matter of time before they'd return to Canada. Ritter found out about the job opening in Toronto and applied. It was a perfect fit.

"We're thrilled about Jennifer's arrival," enthuses Lorraine Sandler, chair of The Holocaust Centre. "She brings with her a whole new set of skills required to take the Centre well into the future. She has already developed and run a successful Holocaust museum and that fact, combined with her empathy and understanding about the needs of a Holocaust learning centre, puts us in great shape."

"In the years that she spent in Orlando, Jennifer Ritter left an indelible personal and professional impact on our community," says Susan Bodner-Levine, president & CEO of the Jewish Federation of Greater Orlando. "Her integrity, professionalism, charm, intelligence and wisdom added so much to our community's mix of programs and services. Toronto is fortunate to have the opportunity to work with Jennifer."

While she's not quite ready to list her specific goals just yet, Ritter clearly wants to take advantage of the tremendous accomplishments already made by The Holocaust Centre.

"My biggest challenge may be how to grow and build upon the impressive legacy that's already been established here," she says, while flipping through The Holocaust Centre schedule for November. "Every day in November we have school trips coming through the Centre. We have a panel of 70 or 80 survivor speakers here. In Orlando we had seven or eight. It's a completely different landscape here. It's wonderful. One thing that I will have to wrap my head around is something that confronts so many Holocaust centres and museums - how to stay relevant in the community while garnering broad-based support."

On November 1, Holocaust Education Week begins its 26th year in and around the Greater Toronto Area, and Ritter is looking forward to being part of what she considers an important time.

"Holocaust Education Week - as it is with all Holocaust education programs – is an important vehicle for teaching humane values and for building a society that is inclusive, caring and compassionate so that bystanding and indifference to suffering are no longer options. Ultimately, that is an important goal of Holocaust education, to build a better, more humane world."

Sukkot campaign promotes tourism to northern Israel

Tens of thousands of Israelis and tourists from around the world rediscovered the beauty of northern Israel during Sukkot, while northern tourist attractions were once again thriving after the devastating financial beating they took during the recent war this summer.

Under the slogan "we stood behind you during the war, we stand behind you now," the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas agency – invited the general public to visit, at no cost, more than 20 national parks and nature reserves thanks to generous donations from Jewish communities worldwide.

"It warms my heart and is truly appreciated that donors would do this for us," says Yossi Hayut, a visitor to one of the sites.

Hayut and his wife, Gili, took their children to Zippori, an ancient hilltop city with great archeological importance for both Christians and Jews. It was here that Rabbi Judah Hanasi lived with the Sanhedrin in 220 C.E.

"During the war my husband, Yossi, fought in Lebanon and I was alone with our three children. I worried about Yossi day and night. Needless to say, we had no summer vacation," says Gili. "I am taking time off from work this Sukkot to be with the family," adds Yossi. "This is the first time that we have been to Zippori and we were only able to come because it is free of charge. Otherwise, the entrance fee for all of us would have been too expensive."

Families enjoyed northern Israeli parks during a special Sukkot campaign by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI).

Menachem and Mazal Vaknin, a religious family from Haifa, are exploring Zippori's living quarters with their three children who suffered from nightmares for a long time after the war.

"Living in Haifa, we really felt the full impact of the war," says Mazal. "There was no vacation, only six weeks of pure terror. We came here today to make up for what we lost in the summer. The fact that it is free of charge enables us to do more traveling and activities than we could normally afford."

As the shadows lengthen and the visitors slowly wend their way towards their cars, Igal Yonash, manager of the Zippori site, surveys the scene with satisfaction.

"Yesterday we had 1,300 visitors and today another 1,400 passed through our gates," says Yonash. "It's great that people are returning."

Ikkarim reaches out to parents of pre-schoolers

By JONATHAN AIN
UJA Federation

How can the Jewish community extend itself to busy parents of pre-school aged children, offering them a meaningful Jewish learning experience?

According to Rabbi Joe Kanofsky, a consultant with the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE), one answer might be found in the upcoming Ikkarim program being launched by UJA Federation at the end of October.

Ikkarim offers Jewish learning opportunities to parents of pre-schoolers.

No prior Jewish or Hebrew education is necessary, and Jews of all views are welcome and encouraged to come with their questions and perspectives.

"What's different about Ikkarim is that rather than preaching or lecturing, this program is really a discussion about empowering Jewish choices," says Rabbi Kanofsky. "Rather than trying to place you in a movement or institution, it's all about giving you the literacy and points of reference to make educated, Jewish choices as a parent of a young family."

Ikkarim instructors include scholars and rabbis, all of whom also happen to be parents of young children.

Ikkarim, which can be literally translated from the classic Hebrew to mean both "roots" and "principles," is a 19-week learning program sponsored by the BJE, tailored to parents of pre-school aged children.

Deb Kram, director of adult learning for Combined Jewish Philanthropy (CJP) in Boston – where Ikkarim was spearheaded three years ago – has seen the program mushroom from one synagogue with 20 participants to eight different locations with over 100 participants. According to Kram, the key success of Ikkarim has been its ability to reach parents at a time in their lives when they are making key decisions about the Jewish future of their children.

"Ikkarim targets a group of people you wouldn't think would have any time to explore religious ethics and values," says Kram. "Yet as it turns out, it is the busiest people, parents of young children – and not necessarily those with any obvious attachment to Judaism – who are the program's most enthusiastic participants. That's because Ikkarim speaks to people at a time of life when they have to come to terms with Jewish issues so they can model them for their kids."

Ikkarim will meet in two sessions – morning and evening at The Family Resource Centre at the Promenade Mall (Bathurst St. between Clark and Centre). Childcare is provided for the morning session. The cost for the 19 week course is $250 which includes all course materials.

Space is limited so please sign up early. For more information, or to register for Ikkarim, call 416.635.2883 ext. 185 or email ikkarim@ujafed.org.

Supporting Israel galvanizes Toronto's diverse Jewish community

All streams of Judaism supporting UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

Is there a single issue that rabbis from all denominations mutually support and believe in?

When it comes to helping Israel, the answer is a resounding yes.

More than 50 Toronto-area rabbis from various streams have jointly pledged to support the UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 (IEC), which is raising funds to help rebuild Israel following the war with Hezbollah last summer and to support essential Jewish services in Toronto.

The IEC, which has already raised $65 million, is funding the urgent psychological and financial needs of northern Israeli residents caused by thousands of terrorist rockets. By the time the campaign is over, UJA Federation expects to send $35 million to Israel for both emergency and regular requirements.

The rabbis recently showed their unity by being signatories to a newspaper ad headlined, "Together with Israel. Together as one."

"The security and survival of Israel is a top priority of the entire Jewish community," said Rabbi Baruch Taub of BAYT (Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation) in Thornhill. "We shouldn't have any second thoughts about signing this type of declaration."

"Israel is in need of emergency support and that's part of our responsibility in the Diaspora to give that extra support: moral, financial or otherwise," said Rabbi Moshe Shulman, religious leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Jewish community members of all backgrounds, seen here at Toronto's Stand With Israel solidarity rally, have come together in support of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007. (Photo by Jen Arron).

In addition to jointly supporting the emergency campaign, the rabbis also called on all members of the Jewish community to donate to the cause.

This united front is not unprecedented.

Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Congregation believes the rabbis have banded together because ensuring Israel's vitality is in the best interests of Jews all over the world.

"The destiny of the Diaspora is directly related to the health and vibrancy of the State of Israel," said Rabbi Saltzman.

"It's in our own interests, as well as the interests of Israel, to support Israel in moments of need."

Shortly after the end of the conflict, after 4,000 rockets rained down on northern Israel, Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai visited the north where the brunt of the damage occurred.

"I met a man who operates a tour site who told me that he had lost income from 4,000 tourists," Rabbi Dolgin said.

"Even if tourism was back to 100 per cent now, he won't get back what he lost."

But on a happier note, the rabbi noted Israelis were very appreciative of the support from Toronto's Jewish community.

"People in Israel turned to me and said Toronto is with us," Rabbi Dolgin said.

"We were the only non-Israelis there and that was very important for them, to see us standing together with them."

Southern U.S. Holocaust film inspires women donors

Tennessee school official urges Lion of Judah members to extend the spirit of Paper Clips

By REBECCA SOBERMAN
UJA Federation

Whitwell, Tennessee Middle School principal Linda Hooper, who inspired the now world-renowned documentary Paper Clips, had a strong message of tolerance for women who, through their UJA Federation donations of at least $5,000 annually, are Lions of Judah.

"Help the children of Whitwell to create a world where love and acceptance are the rule and not the exception," she told 300 women attending the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Lion of Judah luncheon, chaired by Shanitha Kachan and Susan Maldoff.

Paper Clips documents how Whitwell Tennessee students collected one paper clip for each individual exterminated by the Nazis. The result was a memorial railcar filled with 11 million paper clips (representing 6 million Jews and 5 million gypsies, homosexuals and other victims of the Holocaust) which stands permanently in their schoolyard.

(Photos: Jen Arron)

Hooper shared the project's chronology, explaining that she was seeking to enhance her pupils' knowledge and understanding of the world as a global community. "We [in Whitwell], in a town of 1800 people, grew up in a world that is White Anglo Saxon Protestant. We needed to understand the world and know that we are all responsible for each other."

Despite Whitwell's average education level of 6.6 years and a vast majority of residents living below the poverty line, Hooper's goal was to have her students recognize they were still better off than others. So teaching about the atrocity of the Holocaust was, for Hooper, a powerful learning tool to help her students grasp the message. And, in turn, the students taught Hooper an unexpected but important lesson.

"I learned that children are far more intelligent than we give them credit for," remarked Hooper. While teaching about the Holocaust and discussing the six million Jews who perished, one student asked her if it was possible to find some tangible way to measure six million because the number seemed so big. The child explained that the number should be represented by a collection of paper clips. Through self-motivated research, the student discovered that Norwegians wore paper clips on their lapels during the Second World War to protest the Nazi occupation, and the paper clip project began. "You see, children can teach us a thing or two," Hooper added.

The event also featured personal greetings from Toronto Mayor David Miller, who thanked the women for their tremendous support. "By your generosity, you are helping to build a city and that's what makes it a success," he expressed.

The luncheon also featured a campaign update by UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 chairs Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks and by Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A) chair Judith Finer Freedman. The Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 total is now at $65 million, with over $18 million designated for Israel's emergency needs. WC&A has contributed $7.5 million to the campaign total.

A sign of the times in Vaughan

The missing children of Yemen – Pt. 1

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The State of Israel is nothing less than a major miracle – a reborn nation that's home to Jews from more than 100 different countries who speak more than 80 languages; an arid land exploding with blossom; a land that is barren of natural resources yet has a robust, world-class economy; and a land of freedom and democracy. No one thought it was possible, and it was all accomplished in just half a century.

But in all these many glorious and unparalleled stories of success, one dark chapter refuses to go away. It stubbornly resurfaces again and again. Year after year, it nags at the conscience of a people. It's such an upsetting chapter in Israel's history that the response to it is usually one of denial.

I am referring to the missing children of Yemen.

In 1949, the ruler of Yemen, Iman Yichyeh, was murdered and under his son, emigration to Israel became a reality. Tens of thousands of rural Yemenite Jews were convinced that the Mashiach had arrived. They left their homes en masse and came to what was dubbed Camp Geula – the camp of redemption. From there, they were to be transported to Israel. They waited patiently in conditions that were subhuman. State workers sent to facilitate this exodus worked as fast as they could to prevent a human tragedy. All the Jews were eventually evacuated to Israel.

Once there, the Yemenites were brought to Camp Shaar Haaliya, where they were to be registered, examined, inoculated, deloused and disinfected.

Instead, there was total chaos.

What was intended to be a temporary camp soon sprawled out of control. There were no proper sanitary facilities. Food and water distribution was poor. Diseases naturally followed, and intestinal disorders were especially rampant. Children and infants, in particular, could not hold what little food or water they were given, and their numbers were quickly dwindling.

Keep in mind that at this time, the State of Israel was itself just a baby, one fighting for its very existence. As such, it was totally unprepared to handle this tsunami of some 100,000 immigrants. The fact that it did is just one of its many miracles.

The Yemenite Jews responded to their situation with patience and dignity. Yet, leaky tents and extremes in temperature and hunger could be tolerated, but watching their children waste away could not. Parents who themselves were willing to bear all sorts of deprivation, became frantic at the sight of their sick children.

Streams of people, children in tow, surrounded the camp's infirmary tents around the clock. Help was dispensed, but in the worst cases of dehydration, the infirmary would have no choice but to send these children off to hospitals.

The resulting drama of these traumatic moments cannot be overemphasized. Parents were torn, on the one hand unable to care for their sick child while at the same time unable to accompany the child to the hospital. As well, they usually had other children, who were often ill and in desperate need of their attention. Compounding the heartache was the colossal barrier of language: the Yemenites and state workers could barely communicate.

With tears, kisses and prayers, in trust and in innocence, in the midst of confusion and in compliance with authority – and really with no other alternative – parents placed their babies in the arms of nurses.

The children were then taken, alone, to hospitals miles away.

To be continued next month...

'Voices of tomorrow'

Guest Voice

By SUSAN KRASHINSKY

I'll admit that when I first got the call, I thought the whole thing sounded overly ambitious.

It came from the director of education at my parents' synagogue, a man who has known me since I was the proverbial "this big." He wanted to know if I would take part in a service on Yom Kippur at which a few young people would be selected to speak.

I don't spend much time at Temple Sinai anymore. I have called Montreal home for the past eight years or so. But the High Holy Days are a good time to be with my family in Toronto, and so I agreed.

"Great," he replied. "The topic we've decided on is, 'What is the greatest challenge facing the Jewish people today?'"

"But no pressure!" I joked with my mother, to make light of my discomfort. Just recently, when asked to give a lecture on Judaism for a friend's class at McGill University, I came face-to-face with the difficulty of making sweeping statements about such a diverse, living tradition: "I can't speak for all the Jews in this room," I told the students, "let alone all the Jews in the world."

Naturally, I recognized that I was only expected to speak for myself and my own concerns as a young Jewish woman, yet the obligation to identify the single most important issue facing one of the world's oldest religions is a task that could be fairly described as daunting.

My fellow speakers and I arrived to find the service titled, "Voices of Tomorrow: Future Leaders Speak." (I hadn't been aware that I was a leader of tomorrow, but there it was.) And as behooves any group of Jews when asked for their opinions, we all came up with different answers to the question.

Given the topic, it's not surprising that the Holocaust played a major role in these answers. The first speaker took part of his time to tell us about his great uncle's experience during the war. Relating the tale in a rhythm of storytelling that only a loved one can recreate, he described how his great uncle had offered to fix the pocket watch of an official in his labour camp. Though he knew nothing about the watchmakers' trade, he managed to return the item not only in one piece, but in working order. It was a skill that may have saved his life.

The speaker used the story to remind us that we are the last generation to have the opportunity to speak directly to Holocaust survivors. He insisted that our challenge is to make an effort to hear their stories. "Soon, only the questions will remain," he said, "and people will be looking to us for the answers." It will be our duty never to forget.

It was a familiar theme, and I'm sure that it won't be the last time that I will attend a Jewish function where those present are encouraged, quite rightly, to remember their responsibility to history.

What I hadn't expected was the second view of the Holocaust that was presented by another speaker, a high school student who had recently returned from the March of the Living.

Having studied the issue of the conflict in Darfur, the student felt uncomfortable with the "never again" message of the march. While she acknowledged the emotional and historical resonance of the places she visited, she spoke eloquently about her uneasiness with the expectation that being Jewish should cause her to be defined by the Holocaust. It's a discomfort that is not unfamiliar to many of us, and it made sense that these two speakers should focus on a topic that still occupies us so completely.

My expectations were overturned once again when a third person took to the microphone. I felt sure that someone would speak – as we so often do – about the perils of intermarriage among young Jews. Eleanor comes from an interfaith family herself, and has grown understandably tired of being told that she is "the greatest threat facing the Jewish people." She asserted that our preoccupation with intermarriage opens the door for too much intolerance among Jews, and our challenge is to recognize that pluralism does not have to be equated with the destruction of our people.

Continuing the discussion of big issues, another speaker focused his speech on Israel. He spent the past summer there thanks to an Aish Hatorah Hasbara Fellowship. Participants in the program are educated in advocacy for Israel on college campuses, where many students have difficulty with the country's policies. This speaker chose to present a more personal side of Israel, talking about the people he met during one afternoon there, all of whom inspired him in various ways.

As for me, I spoke about the tension that I and many other young Jews feel in reconciling our progressive politics with our need for tradition. I worry that in modernizing ourselves, we may perhaps be letting go of too much. Part of the connection I feel to my religion is its link to a vast history, but in giving too much primacy to that history, we risk stagnation. If we want to remain a living tradition, I argued, we have to continue to ask questions and to challenge ourselves to hold on to our past without compromising our future.

"It's no secret to most of you that many young Jews have become detached from their faith," I said to illustrate this tension.

But listening to the people who spoke alongside me this Yom Kippur, you'd never know it.

Jewish Life

A new book from Rabbi Kushner

Overcoming Life's Disappointments by Harold S. Kushner, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 1981, Harold Kushner, the Conservative rabbi of a suburban Boston congregation, published When Bad Things Happen To Good People.

Surprisingly, it became a runaway bestseller and made him, arguably, the best-known American rabbi.

Rabbi Kushner asked an old and vexing question – would a God who is both omnipotent and good allow the innocent to suffer? He answered the question with a resounding no. God does not cause suffering, rather He empathizes with those who do suffer. God is powerless to prevent people from harming one another – to do so would remove from them their precious, if dangerous, freedom of choice. It was not God who was responsible for Auschwitz, but cruel and barbaric human beings. Moreover, God is limited by the unchanging laws of his own created universe.

These views about God were hardly new or original, but Rabbi Kushner's engaging literary style and ability to distil complex theological ideas for the average reader made him a popular religious guide and mentor.

In all of his books, Rabbi Kushner combines pastoral experience with apt references to books, movies and plays. He refers knowingly to the wisdom that is to be found in the wellsprings of Jewish traditions, as well as to the insights of modern psychology.

To be human is to experience disappointment. Things don't always turn out as we expect. Our dreams remain unrealized. How do we overcome the pain of marital discord, of a lost job, the death of a loved one, prolonged illness, etc?

For answers, the author turns to the many-sided life of Moses to find examples of strength, resilience, patience, humility and faith.

Moses was a sorely tested leader whose triumphs were offset by frustration, rivalry, hostility and ultimate rejection – after years of struggle, he was not permitted to enter the Promised Land.

The author reminds us that the shattered tablets of the Ten Commandments were eventually replaced with new tablets that were to guide untold future generations. The old and the new, the broken dream and the bright promise were placed together in the Ark. There is always the opportunity for victorious vision to replace grievous disappointment.

From the biblical assertion that Moses was the most humble of men, Rabbi Kushner reminds us of our role in the scheme of things. "Humility means recognizing that you are not God and it is not your job or responsibility to run the world. Moses was able to surmount the problems and frustrations in his life because he understood that he was not God and could not be expected to be, and that God's plan for humanity did not depend solely on him."

Rabbi Kushner concludes that "the most valuable, most enduring lesson we can learn from Moses comes not from his successes but from his failures. It is about facing our past with gratitude and our future with confidence, even as we carry with us the memories of dreams that never came true. There are other, more attainable dreams waiting for us."

This book is life affirming, sensible, thoughtful and realistic. Grateful readers will welcome this inspirational and helpful guide.

Solving Israel's water crisis, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at the water crisis in Israel and the region. Today, we look at some possible solutions.

Conservation: First, let's look at how Israelis try to conserve what they do have. Israelis use only 338 cubic metres of water a year per person, compared to 1,682 cubic metres in the United States and 1,494 cubic metres in Canada. [http://tinyurl.com/yhmvxp] But that isn't good enough considering the country's limited resources. Israel's conservation program wants to cut that number further in the agricultural, manufacturing and domestic sectors. [http://tinyurl.com/yzpghj]

Public awareness: Israelis are used to billboards and other ads imploring them to save every drop. But sometimes a lighter approach works. If you can read Hebrew, you can play the Water Game at Israel's water conservation site. Answer the questions right and you'll keep the drop of the water from being wasted. [www.tipa.gov.il/instructions.htm] If you want to be more water savvy, read the water tips from Jewish National Fund and the International Arid Lands Consortium. They make sense even if you don't live in a desert. [http://tinyurl.com/y8oz94]

Drip irrigation: Despite its current problems, Israel has seen much success in its battle to conserve water. Visitors to Israel will be familiar with "drip irrigation" and the plastic tubing that snakes its way through city parks and kibbutzim. The slow drop-by-drop method of watering deposits just enough water above or below surface. Thanks mostly to drip irrigation, Israel's water requirements for apples, bananas and potatoes declined by more than half after its introduction. [http://tinyurl.com/z9cma]

I recommend a four-minute video created by KTEH Public Television titled Last Oasis, which praises Israel's efforts in recycling and drip irrigation but also has an unsettling warning. Professor Amos Banin of Hebrew University draws an interesting analogy to describe the limits of artificial irrigation. He compares the technology to the life of a married couple. "There is the honeymoon between the irrigator and the land… [but] after some decades, there is an increasing deterioration of the land as a result of irrigation." Throughout the world – Israel included – artificial irrigation is taking its toll on the land. [http://tinyurl.com/hoh94]

Rainfall enhancement: Israel began seeding clouds with silver iodide crystals over the Lake Kinneret basin in 1976. Cloud-seeding in Israel can significantly increase rainfall in a normal winter and produce as much as an additional 80 million cubic metres of water. Traditional cloud-seeding is only effective when there are suitable rain clouds in the area, and even then, there is no guarantee that the rain will fall exactly where needed. [http://tinyurl.com/kudau]

Currently researchers from Belgium, Israel and California are working on a different way to make rain. For Project Geshem, several square kilometres of land are covered with black, solar-absorbing material that bounces the sunlight's energy back into the lower atmosphere. "The heated air rises taking water condensation high enough to form clouds and produce out-of-season rain." [http://tinyurl.com/lb5ao]

Importing water: In 2004, Israel and Turkey agreed to a 20-year proposal in which Turkey would ship water to meet three per cent of Israel's consumption. Due to rising costs, that deal was scrapped in April of this year. [http://tinyurl.com/nnu5m] But the following month, the two countries were negotiating the construction of four underwater pipelines that would transfer water, electricity, natural gas and oil to Israel. The oil sent to Israel would then be transferred by tankers to countries including India, China and South Korea. There was no word on the cost of the project or how much water it would deliver to Israel. [http://tinyurl.com/hfl3l]

Next week, unearthing an ancient waterworks, making saltwater potable and plans to link the Red Sea to the Dead Sea.

Science teacher honoured by Tiferes Bais Yaakov

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Earlier this year Peter Salmon was honoured by Tiferes Bais Yaakov, the Orthodox girls' high school where he teaches science, as its general studies teacher of distinction.

The 51-year-old educator is relatively new to the classroom, however. About six years ago, Salmon had to give up dentistry after 22 years of practice when he developed a hand tremor as a result of Parkinson's disease. A Jewish day school principal heard him give a shiur about the weekly Torah portion at Thornhill's Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Congregation and suggested he might be able to transfer his innate teaching skills to the day school classroom.

A teacher of Grade 12 biology, Grade 11 chemistry and Grade 10 general science, Salmon, who has a degree in science from the University of Toronto, says he prepared meticulously to teach the Ontario ministry's science curriculum when he joined the school four years ago as a part-time teacher.

His classroom style blends academics with sharing of real life experience, Torah insight and humour.

A blurb about Salmon on the school's website, in the context of his recent honour, described him as "the consummate science teacher" who translates "complex material to manageable subject matter."

A somewhat reticent interviewee, he said he is happy about the accolades the school gave him, but that he doesn't like being in the limelight.

Having had teenage children of his own helped him understand his students' mindset, said Salmon, who was one of the coaches for his sons' basketball team at Yeshivat Or Chaim a few years ago. He and his wife Roslyn, also a teacher, have three sons, now age 20, 22 and 25.

"Kids can see through somebody pretty quickly," Salmon told The CJN.

Despite the tremor that results in "not ideal" handwriting – which he jokes about – and the fatigue he sometimes battles as a side effect of Parkinson's and rheumatoid arthritis, he considers himself lucky, he stressed.

A lesson from the teacher: "It's a competitive world out there. You have to strive for excellence, [even if] you get a 'C.' Every child has their niche. Sometimes it takes longer to find it."

"This is what life gave me. You make the best of it."

He credits his wife for her support at home, and his principals and fellow staff for easing his transition into the school.

Having family responsibilities and being an observant Jew were also factors in making the switch to this new stage. Based on conversations with others who have chronic illnesses, Salmon said that "[having] a faith system seems to be a bedrock."

He enjoys the interaction with his students, as well as the opportunity to stimulate their minds, he said.

"You do the best you can to motivate them," said Salmon, adding that at the same time, he reminds his students that marks are not everything. "Sometimes, the kids who get the C's in school get the A's in life."

JETT program hopes to take on young passengers

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

There's a new "JETT"-setting crowd, and they're heading not just on any course – they're taking a course toward spiritual fulfilment. And they won't be passing through customs, but instead they'll be learning about Jewish customs.

Indeed, the "first class" of a new learning program called Jewish Empowerment Through Torah, or JETT, begins soon. It is specifically for men and women in their 20s and 30s who crave Jewish learning in a way that's most comfortable for them.

Offering lectures, seminars, Hebrew reading workshops, open discussions, and Shabbat dinners, JETT's programs are free.

JETT takes off Nov. 5 and ends Dec. 16. The fall session includes courses called "Torah and Science," "Spiritual DNA: Its Vast Impact on Civilization" and "Soul Searching: Cognitive Keys for a Spiritual Life."

Arnie Gotfryd, who created this program and others like it, says that he expects hundreds of students to attend.

Gotfryd lectured for many years at the University of Toronto. He has won several academic prizes including a grant for his popular university course called "Faith and Science." He has penned a number of books and articles on the topic of Judaism and has lectured in more than 20 cities.

The idea for JETT came to Gotfryd around Rosh Hashanah of this year, during a gathering with some of his former students. They became nostalgic about the daily learning program he once ran, which ended because Gotfryd had other commitments. They urged him to bring it back. He agreed, and people eagerly volunteered to help him. He says he's pleased to see the program take hold in a grassroots manner, where students are enlisting other students to enroll.

Gotfryd's work in outreach began in 1997, when he and his wife, Leah, bought their home in Thornhill for their family of 10, with the intent of turning the expansive basement into a shul. "Of course, it was a sacrifice, especially since the kids were hoping for floor hockey games down there, but everybody was wonderful with it from the beginning."

The minyan actually moved in about a month before they did.

"A few families in the neighbourhood were thrilled from the start to have a warm chassidic shul right around the corner. That's when I realized how important this little shtiebl [small chapel] was. There were literally dozens of kids from observant families hanging out as kids do, most of whom were already quite alienated from their traditions," he says.

Gotfryd made sure that the synagogue wasn't just for praying, but for learning and teaching, too. By teaching students a few core ideas, many got turned back on to Judaism, he says.

This morphed into a formalized "night yeshiva" with adult education at all levels, seven days a week. The biggest draw he says was a free Hebrew crash course designed for absolute beginners. "They loved getting into their Jewish roots. We need all the identity boosting we can get," he says.

More than 200 people learned to read Hebrew and another 300 participated in other courses and special lectures, boasts Gotfryd. "People need to know that the Torah is cool, and perfectly relevant in a modern world," he says.

JETT's faculty consists of 10 teachers, who have diverse backgrounds and talents, and are volunteers from the Chabad community.

"When people see that teachers are giving of their own free time for complete strangers just to share something good, it rubs off. Then the students also turn into givers who want to give back."

The instructors and programs have received endorsements from community leaders such as Rabbi Dovid Schochet, head of the Vaad HaRabbanim of Greater Toronto, and Rabbi Yosaif Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto.

Gotfryd, who follows chassidic traditions, maintains that his centre uses teaching tools that have for decades proven successful around the globe.

"The chassidic approach is very special. It's very positive and non-judgmental," he says. "It doesn't matter who you are or where you are on the ladder as long as you're growing. Chassidic philosophy is another unique factor. It really focuses on the big questions of life, God, the soul, and the significance of the Jewish journey for the fulfilment of mankind."

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK
Opening Program

In 1933, the Nazis classified almost half of Germany's nearly 20,000 lawyers as Jewish.

What happened to them – and to Germany's justice system – after Hitler came to power?

THE HOLOCAUST: FROM THE RULE OF LAW TO THE NIGHTMARE OF OPPRESSION – AND BACK AGAIN

THE HON. BOB RAE, Former Ontario Premier, will discuss how the Nazis twisted the idea of the rule of law, how law was used as an instrument of oppression from 1933 to 1945, and how the Nuremberg Laws became the Nuremberg Trials. He will also reflect on how broad concepts of international and humanitarian law are essential to our ideas of justice in today's world.

Collins among 40,000 Hungarian refugees

In 1943, Leon was called up by the Hungarian army and, as a Jew, was inducted into a labour battalion. Told that he would be sent to the front, he deliberately broke his leg – not once but twice. "All the others who went, his friends, never came back," Collins said ruefully.

Shortly after Germany's invasion, the pro-German Hungarian government began to deport Jews to Auschwitz. One day, Collins and her mother were ordered to report to a railway station in Budapest. She thinks they would have been deported straight to Poland had their luck run out.

"We were there for three days, and then, suddenly, released."

She speculates that Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish humanitarian who rescued tens of thousands of Jews from the clutches of the Nazis and their Hungarian collaborators, may have intervened on their behalf.

Having reached the edge of the abyss, Bertha decided she could only save herself and her daughter, her only child, through drastic measures. Removing the mandatory yellow star from her coat, she approached the Spanish consulate in Budapest. She had heard that protective passes were being handed out by Spain, a neutral country during World War II.

Informed by a guard that she was too late, Bertha didn't take no for an answer. As a bread truck made a delivery, she slipped into the consulate, then climbed a flight of steps and barged into an office.

"She begged a consul to save her family. 'We have nowhere to go. Give us Spanish protection,' she said. The consul was impressed by her courage, and that's how we were saved."

Remembering their days in Hungary during the Holocaust, Collins' parents desperately wanted to join her in the quest to live in the West.

"But they were too old to cross the border illegally," she said. "They preferred to leave legally. I was young and adventurous, and they were not. "

Collins and a group of 30 Hungarians paid a farmer to lead them to safety into neighbouring Austria. "But on the day we were supposed to leave, he was drunk and we had to do it ourselves. It took us only a night to reach the border, but it was a scary and dangerous trip. Russian patrols were everywhere."

She spent the next two months in a refugee camp in Vienna. "Conditions were not bad. We were young and hopeful. The Austrian government helped a lot."

After waiting in line for a couple of days at the Canadian consulate, Collins finally received permission to immigrate to Canada. "The Canadians were generous. Canada paid for my passage to Halifax."

She arrived on Jan. 5, 1957, after a 10-day voyage, during which she was seasick. Upon arrival, an immigration officer gave her a tube of toothpaste, a loaf of bread and a $5 bill. Yet she found Halifax was disappointing, a pale imitation of a sophisticated European city.

"It looked very provincial, but the people were kind."

Collins and her fellow Hungarian newcomers boarded a train for Montreal in the dead of a typical Canadian winter.

"I didn't know anyone in Montreal, but a social worker directed us to a hostel. She said that it would be dry and warm, that we wouldn't freeze."

The day after her arrival, she found a job at a television factory at a salary of $25 a week. "We all wanted to work. There was no welfare."

She went through a number of menial jobs in eight months before landing one as a cosmetician. "By then, I spoke English and already had a better life."

In 1959, her parents left Hungary. They settled in Los Angeles, where her father's brother lived. Leon died in 1971. Bertha passed away last year, six months shy of her 100th birthday, in Toronto.

A year after their departure from Hungary, Collins relocated to Toronto and opened a cosmetics shop.

"Cosmetics was a new field back then. I showed Canadian women how to take care of their skin. I had a busy little business and made a nice career for myself. The business was my baby."

Her first marriage, in 1964, ended in divorce. Today she is happily married to her second husband, an architect. Their daughter is a teacher.

Since her retirement eight years ago, she has returned to an old love, painting. Collins has donated some of her paintings to Mount Sinai Hospital and the proceeds from others to orphanages in Israel.

"I have tried hard to integrate myself into Canadian society, but I have not assimilated completely. I speak Hungarian at home and I have Hungarian friends. Nevertheless, I am a Canadian first and a Hungarian second. I feel very lucky this country took me in. I kiss the ground in Canada."

New Mizrachi director heads Thornhill congregation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg has been juggling two full-time jobs since since Sept. 1, shortly after his arrival in Toronto. How does he do it? "Very carefully, and with great dedication," he says with a mix of humour and seriousness.

On weekdays the rabbi can usually be found at the offices of Mizrachi Canada, where he is now executive director. He is also the first full-time spiritual leader of Congregation Ayin L'Tzion, a three-year-old congregation with about 50 member families housed at Thornhill's Netivot HaTorah Day School.

The rabbi grew up on New York's Lower East Side – "a very colourful place" – where as a child he attended Mesivta Tiferes Yerushalayim, the yeshiva of renowned Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, a neighbour of the Rosenberg family.

Now 37, Rabbi Rosenberg served most recently as spiritual leader of Congregation Ohav Zedek in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., just over 200 kilometres from New York, where he moved in 1997. While there, he also served as chair and posek (halachic decisor) of the Vaad Hakashrus of Luzerne County, which oversees the local mikvah, eruv, chevrah kadisha and kashrut standards.

Prior to his time in Pennsylvania, he was a rabbi in Birmingham, Ala. for three years.

The rabbi's most recent move brings him to a larger Jewish community with more educational options for his six children, who range in age from 2 to 13. Wilkes-Barre, despite its Jewish day school and small Orthodox community, has a Jewish population of less than 3,000, compared to the GTA's 200,000.

The move also brings the Rosenbergs closer to family. Rabbi Rosenberg's wife, Chaya Stern, a vocational rehabilitational therapist, is the daughter of Rabbi Moshe Stern of

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg

Shaarei Tefillah Congregation. The couple met through her brother Tzvi, who studied with Rabbi Rosenberg at a Mercaz HaTorah yeshiva in Israel.

Rabbi Rosenberg also studied at New Jersey's Ramapo College, where he earned a bachelor of science degree. As well, he has a post-graduate degree in advanced rabbinics and synagogue management from Touro College in New York.

As a rabbi in the United States, his community involvement included serving on hospital ethics committees. "I still keep my finger on the pulse of what's going on [in science]," he said.

Rabbi Rosenberg obtained his smichah from Rabbi Berel Wein at Yeshiva Shaarei Torah in Monsey, N.Y. He pursued a pulpit career out of a desire to apply his Torah studies in a practical context and "reach out to fellow Jews." Also, he added, his uncles were rabbis (non-pulpit), his parents – an electrical engineer and a guidance counsellor – were involved in the community, and his grandfather was an early synagogue president of the first Young Israel congregation on the Lower East Side.

As a youngster, Rabbi Rosenberg grew up in a Mizrachi congregation. The religious Zionist movement helps people develop "a love for the land of Israel through the Torah of Israel," the rabbi said. Also, he noted, it supports Torah institutions in Israel.

Upcoming Mizrachi events with which he is involved include a dinner on Nov. 13 honouring Joyce and Herb Green and Jerry Rosenfield and a Nov. 20 lecture by Rabbi Shlomo Riskin. The dinner proceeds will help rebuild former Gush Katif communities in the Negev. Recently, Mizrachi co-sponsored a Torah lecture by Rabbi Hershel Schachter of Yeshiva University.

Referring to both his new positions, Rabbi Rosenberg said he looks forward to "working with and reaching out to the entire community in order to promote the values and ideals of Torah Judaism."

Having been an active board member of Wilkes-Barre's Jewish federation, he looks forward to becoming involved with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

In Wilkes-Barre, he said, rabbis of all denominations "worked together for the benefit of the community.

"There will always be philosophical differences, but we're all Jews, and we've all been given the same Torah."

Honoree motivated by need for 'strong leadership'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Warren Kimel says he was "a little shocked" that the dinner honouring him Nov. 7 at Beth Sholom Synagogue has sold out.

"I'm just a guy," he said, comparing himself to some of the more widely known government and community leaders who were also recipients of the synagogue's annual Humanitarian Award, now in its 55th year. "And I don't even like asking for money."

Warren Kimel

The latter comment may be surprising, given Kimel's position last year as co-chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2006 campaign that raised $58 million.

Yet asking for money is not Kimel's forté, he insisted in a recent interview in the well-appointed office he occupies at the headquarters of Fabricland, the Canada-wide business run by Kimel and founded almost 39 years ago by his father, Manny, who now has Alzheimer's disease.

Kimel, 56, says he didn't ask for money for UJA, but rather "told a story. I tell the people what Israel needs and what Toronto needs. I'm not really asking for money; I'm stating a purpose... If I understand a cause, I can talk, but you have to believe in the cause."

Kimel has been involved with an impressive array of causes, including several federation projects. A board member and past president of Beth Sholom, he has also served on the boards of United Synagogue Day School, Baycrest Centre Foundation, and Jewish National Fund. He is Toronto co-chair of State of Israel Bonds, and a past president of B'nai Brith Canada's B'nai Brith lodge.

As a board member of the Baycrest Centre Foundation, he oversaw a $15-million family donation to the centre as his family's representative. It's the largest single gift that Baycrest has ever received. The funds will go to Baycrest's Brain Health Care facility, which is being renamed the Brain Health Centre – Kimel Family Building, as well as to kick off a fundraising campaign for research on treatment and prevention of brain diseases and disorders, and to establish the Elkie Adler MS Clinic. It will be named for Kimel's sister, who died last year.

The family, which also includes Warren's brother Ronald, also donated $7.5 million to the federation's Tomorrow campaign to establish the Kimel Family Education Centre, the new home of the north campus of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. It's expected to open in 2007 on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

The Kimel family also supports non-Jewish causes, including the United Way of Greater Toronto, Best Buddies (an organization that helps mentally challenged people), Bloorview Kids Rehab and the National Ballet of Canada.

Warren Kimel got his start in community work as a board member at United Synagogue Day School, although he and his wife Debbie – who encouraged him to get involved and who is involved in a variety of causes herself – had already been to Israel on a UJA Young Leadership mission. Also, Marty Goldberg, a fellow board member whom he's known since their days at Forest Hill Collegiate, served as "sort of my mentor."

Kimel said his father, whose Fabricland office he now uses, always told him, "You have to give back."

Having a business where he can delegate responsibilities – he joined Fabricland 31 years ago after earning his bachelor of science degree at the University of Western Ontario – allows Kimel to devote time to charitable work, he said. "I'm lucky that way."

He is also motivated by a desire to set an example for the next generation – his four children range in age from 19 to 23 – and the belief that "the community needs strong leadership.

"If you want to be in the community and you have the wherewithal, you should give back, you should be a leader, and you should be responsible."

Shalom backed Gaza pullout

Shalom said the Israeli army should attack terrorist bases in Gaza on a massive scale. "We should consider an operation like Defensive Shield," he said, referring to Israel's raids into the West Bank in the spring of 2002.

"It dramatically reduced terrorist attacks," he noted.

Suggesting that Israel had no option but to cede Gaza, he said, "I agreed to the withdrawal, but a withdrawal based on a bilateral agreement with the Palestinians would have been better."

Shalom said he worked from the assumption that a withdrawal would deprive the Palestinians of a pretext to fire Qassams at Israel.

Yet Israel had no alternative but to give up Gaza. "We couldn't stay in Gaza. There was no way."

Turning to Egypt, he accused the Egyptians of laxity in failing to stop the smuggling of arms from the Sinai Peninsula into Gaza.

Shalom said Israel will have to free Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails to gain the release of Gilad Shalit, the soldier kidnapped by Hamas gunmen last June.

He also said he's not sure whether Bashar Assad, the president of Syria, was sincere when he called for a resumption of talks with Israel in a series of recent media interviews.

"On the one hand, he seems sincere. On the other hand, he is not sincere. I don't know if he is playing games."

When Shalom was foreign minister, he dispatched an envoy to meet with Assad's brother-in-law to sound out Syria's intentions toward Israel. The meeting took place shortly after the allied invasion of Iraq.

Asked about the outcome, Shalom said, "I can't get into the details."

In his view, Israel can only agree to a resumption of talks with Syria when the Syrians stop funnelling weapons to Hezbollah and close down the offices and training camps of Hamas and Islamic Jihad in Syria.

"They should change the locks to show their sincerity," Shalom said.

He would not be drawn into a discussion about the depth of an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights should Israel reach an accord with Syria in the future. As he put it, "No one should ask for an outcome in advance."

Shalom doubts whether Hezbollah will relinquish its struggle against Israel, even if Israel pulls out of the disputed Shebaa Farms area. "Hezbollah will find another excuse to attack us. Don't be naive."

Voicing concern that many young Arabs have adopted Hezbollah's narrative that Arab territory can only be regained by force, Shalom said, "It's a problem that they have bought this ridiculous narrative. But they should know that we will win every war."

In closing, Shalom praised Harper. "He is very good. His statements are very encouraging. It shows Canada is a strong ally and a strong friend of Israel."

Conference set for children of Holocaust survivors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The third conference for children of Holocaust survivors is set for Oct. 29 at the Baycrest Wagman Centre.

Titled Inheriting the Past and Influencing the Future, the daylong conference includes speakers Susan Bendor, associate professor of Wurzweiler School of Social Work; Anne Balaban, an educator and trainer; and Susan Jackson, executive director of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Will be held Oct. 29 at Wagman Centre

A panel discussion will feature Hindy Friedman, a daughter of survivors, and Bob Czincz, a child survivor. Moderator will be Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, and a child of survivors.

Paula David, conference co-ordinator with Eva Dojc and Margie Levitt, said the first seminar was organized because they realized that children of Holocaust survivors had diverse needs.

"They had a lot in common when they were part of young families, but now they're in their 40s and 50s, and their parents are elderly or gone. Many are part of the sandwich generation.

"Baycrest is taking care of a lot of Holocaust survivors and we realize that they each have unique concerns. The second generation finds strength through mutual support and understanding. They are like an extended family – they understand what others don't get," says David.

The whole Holocaust legacy has fallen into the laps of the second generation, says David. "What is their role in carrying on the legacy, and what does this mean for future generations?"

David says that rather than being depressing, the conference always proves to be energizing and uplifting.

Arbib, Babra honoured at B'nai Brith dinner

Instead, the prime minister told the crowd that Israel "can count on Canada's steadfast support, encouragement and friendship," and he urged all Canadians to be "guided by our values: freedom, democracy, human rights, the rule of law and the uncompromising opposition to terrorism."

"The State of Israel, a democratic nation, was attacked by Hezbollah, a terrorist organization. In fact, a terrorist organization listed illegal in this country," Harper said, noting that Canada is fighting terrorists in Afghanistan and that police have arrested a group of alleged terrorist plotters in Toronto.

"I understand that with the news reports of the day, and the sound of battle, the images of destruction and the suffering of innocents, it is sometimes difficult to see and keep the focus on what is truly at stake.

"But the fact is this: those who attacked Israel, and those who sponsored such attacks, don't seek merely to gain some leverage, to alter some boundary or to right some wrong. They seek what they and those like them have always sought: the destruction of Israel and the destruction of the Jewish people. Those who seek to destroy the Jews, who seek to destroy Israel, will for the same reason ultimately seek to destroy us all, and that, my friends, is why Canada's new government has reacted with speed and spoken with clarity on recent events in the Middle East."

Harper dismissed claims that his stance on the Middle East is a departure from what some describe as Canada's traditional role in foreign affairs.

"Some have claimed that this is charting a radical new course in foreign affairs. That is simply not accurate," he said. "Rather than charting a new course, we are restoring Canada to its traditional and true role, principled leadership in world affairs – a Canada that knows where it stands, speaks up for what is right and invests in the tools of diplomacy, foreign aid, intelligence and military capability."

The prime minister also referred to the need for Israelis and Palestinians to reach a peaceful agreement and establish a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

"I need to tell you that we must also seek a fair and just solution for the Palestinians," he said. "Our government believes in a two-state solution in a secure, democratic and prosperous Israel living beside a viable, democratic and peaceful Palestinian state."

He said that other countries in the Middle East need to follow the lead of Egypt and Jordan, which took "tremendous steps" to make peace with Israel.

"They know the benefits to peace. We think the time is long overdue for others in the region to join them."

Harper said he believes ordinary Palestinians want peace as much as Israelis do.

"Other than terrorists and extremists, or the fanatics, who wakes up each day and wishes that the public life in their community or their country will be an endless cycle of hate, violence, oppression and corruption? No one. But in the end, that is all that they will ever achieve and why we must be so ever vigilant against them."

Harper said that despite Israel's commitment to fighting terrorism and protecting Israeli citizens, Israel found itself in a war it never wanted to wage.

"[The current Israeli government] wasn't elected to wage war, but to pursue peace. And this is the great tragedy, because Prime Minister [Ehud] Olmert and [former] prime minister [Ariel] Sharon before him sought a mandate to break the mould and find a new way forward, not to have the same battle yet again over the same ground."

He said that both Olmert and Sharon have been willing to make "painful compromises for peace. This is the sort of leadership, initiative and commitment that we need and that we have come to expect from the great State of Israel."

After Harper's speech, B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant told him: "Every Shabbat, every Saturday, we recite [a] prayer for you, Mr. Prime Minister. I believe that the Almighty has answered our prayers."

He also presented Harper with a plaque that said the prime minister's "actions are in harmony with his personal integrity, as he fights without compromise, the challenges of our time."

In an Oct. 19 statement responding to Harper's speech, the Canadian Arab Federation said that the "unconditional support for Israel" expressed by the prime minister is a "dangerous path for Canada's foreign policy." It added that "Harper is tarnishing Canada's reputation and repudiating Canadian values by associating his government" so closely with Israel.

New shaliach serves Habonim Dror, small communities in Ontario

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

New shaliach Eitan Grinspun hasn't experienced a Canadian winter yet, but he considers himself lucky to be working in "such a warm community."

Grinspun, 33, arrived in Canada in August and began working at Camp Gesher in Cloyne, Ont. The camp is affiliated with Habonim Dror, the Labour Zionist youth movement where Grinspun is a shaliach from the Jewish Agency for Israel. He replaces Omer Eshel, who returned to Israel in September after a three-year stint.

Eshel's "Shelach" program at Bialik Hebrew Day School will continue to be run by Grinspun. The three-year-old program involves experiential education about Israel.

Grinspun and Shaul Zobary, director of Habonim Dror and Camp Gesher, are also developing another interactive school program that will explore Jewish and Israeli history through the introduction of historical personages including biblical characters and more recent personalities like Eliezer Ben-Yehuda and Chana Senesh.

In addition to his Habonim Dror duties, Grinspun serves as a shaliach for Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO), running educational programs for children and adults in smaller Jewish communities outside of Toronto.

Eitan Grinspun

"We're planning a huge Chanukah drive," he said of the RJCO activities, which include three Shabbatonim a year. This year, the themed weekends centre around Jewish identity, he said.

The Chanukah program, which is open to Torontonians who want to participate, will begin in Sault Ste. Marie, where the first candle of the holiday will be lit, and will travel to other communities throughout the week.

Also in his RJCO capacity, Grinspun is available to field questions about Israeli culture, identity and society on a new "Ask Our Shaliach" web page (http://www.rjco.ca/home.do?ch=didYouKnow).

A native of Eilat, Grinspun is the son of Argentinian olim whose house has always been a gathering place for family and friends. "They never invite two people; they invite 20," he said.

Working out of the Borochov Centre with Zobary, Grinspun is excited about the youth group's programs such as a new "Ken Rikud" (Israeli dance program) for parents and children, and a new partnership with the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation. Habonim Dror is running educational programs for young teenagers out of the synagogue.

In Israel, for the past six years, Grinspun managed the student dormitories at Tel Aviv University (TAU), where he enjoyed its mix of Jewish and Arab Israelis, overseas students and new immigrants.

An alumnus of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem where he earned a BA in international relations, and also of TAU where he earned a diploma in mediation and negotiation, Grinspun said that he likes working with people. As a student, he worked at Kol Yisrael radio station editing programs for youth.

His main goal now is to "work with youth starting to form their own ideas."

Habonim Dror brings together "all the things I believe in," Grinspun said, citing Judaism, Israel, socialism, tikkun olam and the movement's Jewishly pluralistic nature.

The group is joining forces with other local youth movements to host a memorial ceremony for slain Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin on November 4, he noted.

The product of a secular home, Grinspun spent a summer working as a counsellor at the Conservative movement's Camp Ramah in Massachusetts, and has a close friend who is a Conservative rabbi.

As a youngster in Israel, he was involved with Ha'Noar Haoved (the Israeli Equivalent of Habonim Dror) for a short time.

First of Stern's Nazi-looted art recovered

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Almost 70 years after a German Jewish art dealer was forced by the Nazis to sell it off at a bargain-basement price, a painting of an exotic young woman has been restored to its rightful owner, the estate of the late Max Stern.

Stern, who died in 1987, owned the Dominion Gallery in Montreal for four decades and became one of Canada's leading art promoters.

Aimee, a Young Egyptian by 19th-century Frenchman Emile C.H. Vernet-Lecomte is the first artwork that has been recovered among the more than 400 pieces Stern is believed to have had to liquidate from his Dusseldorf art gallery between 1935 and 1937.

The portrait of a spangled raven-haired beauty in billowing costume, which sold at auction in New York five years ago for close to $100,000 (US), was returned by Sotheby's, after the London-based auction house discovered through its own research the painting's tainted provenance.

The identity of the consigner and the party that bought the painting, or the nature of the settlement were not revealed, although lawyer Robert Vineberg, an executor of the Stern estate, said there was no financial compensation.

Sotheby's Lucian Simmons said it is obliged to keep confidential everything about the negotiations and would not even say if the purchaser was American or, in fact, an individual. He did say that the party was "very emotional" about the matter.

The painting was unveiled with great flourish at a press conference last Thursday at Concordia University's Faculty of Fine Arts Gallery. Concordia launched an international effort in March 2005, headed by cultural-property specialist Clarence Epstein, to track down and recover all of the artworks Stern was forced to sell.

Max and Iris Stern, who had no children, left the bulk of their assets, including a 5,000-piece art collection, to Concordia, McGill University and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

This painting, however, was not among the 10 to 15 located so far in Europe, the United States and Taiwan, mostly at auction houses, galleries and recently in museums.

Willi Korte, the German-American lawyer overseeing the investigation for the Stern estate, said Aimee was retrieved without any of the wrangling, often in the courts, that accompanies looted-art claims.

"Sotheby's on its own took all the necessary steps. There was not a great deal of bargaining, discussing or settling. It went very smoothly and very quickly. I hope this will be an example to other claims," he said.

In 2002, Sotheby's, acting on information it received, began to look into the painting's history, long before the Stern restoration project began or Sotheby's had even heard of Stern, said Simmons, senior vice-president of its restitution department in New York.

It found Aimee was among the final approximately 250 paintings from the Stern gallery auctioned off in 1937 by the Lempertz house in Cologne. How it ended up in the United States was also not made known.

Confirming that this was in fact the same painting was not easy, Korte added, because it was listed under a different title and was not illustrated in the Lempertz catalogue. Investigators positively identified it by the measurements. They then called Epstein.

Stern probably received only "a few cents on the dollar" of the discount prices the lot went for, Epstein said. Soon after, Stern fled to Britain, from which he was deported as an enemy alien in 1941 to an internment camp in Quebec. After the war, Stern tried to recover the art, but only managed to get back a few works, Epstein said.

Aimee arrived at Concordia coincidentally with the opening of a text and photo exhibition the art faculty and students have created, titled "Auktion 392: Reclaiming the Galerie Stern, Dusseldorf," which traces the history of the gallery, opened in 1913 by Max's father Julius, and its destruction under Nazi propaganda chief Josef Goebbel's plan to eliminate Jews from the art trade.

That is the number assigned by Lempertz to the lot auctioned off in 1937, and the exhibit, which continues until Nov. 13, includes reproductions from the lavishly illustrated catalogue and other historical documents. Aimee will be on display for a few weeks at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts by the end of this month, said chief curator Nathalie Bondil. Stern was a benefactor of the museum, she noted, and the museum is committed to the search for ill-gotten artwork. The painting will then tour with "Auktion 392" to elsewhere in North America, Europe and Israel for the next two years.

Epstein noted that Stern's losses represent just a fraction of the 140,000 artworks believed to have been confiscated, sold under duress or gone missing during the Nazi era, and the great majority have never been recovered.

The Stern estate is working closely with the Holocaust claims processing office of the New York State Banking Department. Sherri North Cohen, a lawyer with the office, said the Nazis violated international law by forcing Jews to sell their art. Korte, however, added that there are no simple legal remedies to restore looted art, and outside of North America and the "Anglo-Saxon" world, there is less sympathy for claims. He tries to use a combination of moral, political and finally legal arguments in each case, and it can take years.

The Stern estate is currently in a legal battle in a Rhode Island court for a 19th-century painting by Franz Xavier Winterhalter, owned by an elderly German baroness, Maria-Louise Bissonnette. Her stepfather bought it at the 1937 Lempertz auction. In September, it came to light that she had spirited the painting out of the country to Germany where she wants a court there to decide what should be done.

Court's ruling expected to have far-reaching consequences

– unanimously ruled that Superior Court Justice Israel Mass had been wrong 2½ years earlier when he decided that Marcovitz had entered into a contract and therefore it was civilly enforceable, despite the fact that it obliged him to participate in a religious act. The original Superior Court decision was hailed by advocates for the rights of agunot, women whose husbands withhold a get from them when their marriage dissolves.

The Court of Appeal said the federal Divorce Act does not give courts jurisdiction to force anyone to issue a get, no matter what the divorcing parties have previously consented to. It also ruled that the 1990 amendment to the act requiring spouses to remove barriers to the other's religious remarriage before a civil divorce is granted was not relevant in this case because of a legal technicality.

Marcovitz and Bruker married in 1969 and were divorced in 1981, when she was 31. She was almost 47 when she received the get from him.

Bruker's lawyer Alan Stein said the Supreme Court's ruling will have far-reaching consequences for not only the Jewish community but for all Canadians, because it will affect the validity of any agreement of a religious or moral nature.

BARAK
Silver & 14K

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association is intervening in the case "because we see this as important and potentially precedent-setting on the manner in which religious practices and obligations are treated by the courts," said its counsel, Andrew Lokan of Toronto. The Lawyers Weekly, a journal for the legal community, featured the case on its front page earlier this month.

Stein thinks his client is entitled to damages just as a woman who sues for breach of promise after a fiance backs out of a planned religious wedding is. "The courts can't force the man to marry her, but there's still a civil obligation to pay damages."

Although the Supreme Court is not expected to pronounce specifically on the Divorce Act amendment, Stein believes that if the high court agrees with the Quebec appellate court about it, "it's sure someone will attack [the Divorce Act amendment] constitutionality."

Stein said he knows a lawyer awaiting the outcome of the case before he proceeds with one he thinks it will have a bearing on. He is representing a non-Jewish woman who is being refused burial in the cemetery of the Reform congregation where her late Jewish husband is interred. The couple was married at the congregation.

The Quebec court's rejection of the relevance of the Divorce Act amendment had weakened its impact, Stein believes. He calls it a blow to the long struggle to gain some legal protection for Jewish women whose estranged husbands use the get for blackmail or revenge.

Bruker, who now lives in New York now, launched a $500,000 lawsuit against Marcovitz in 1989 (it was increased to $1.35 million in 1995 after the get was granted). The following year, she filed an affidavit under the just-passed amendment.

Marcovitz's lawyer, Anne-France Goldwater, said the Court of Appeal made a good decision because it reinforces that courts "cannot interfere in matters of faith and conscience." Goldwater had argued that the case was not justiciable and that the Divorce Act amendment was unconstitutional. (No ruling was made on the latter point.)

Court of Appeal justice Allan Hilton wrote: "Although one cannot help but be sympathetic to the plight of a Jewish woman whose former husband delays or denies her a get, whether or not he has entered into a prenuptial agreement to do so or (as in the case) in the context of a consent to corollary relief, I have concluded that the substance of the former husband's obligation is religious in nature, irrespective of the form in which the obligation is stated and, accordingly, that an alleged breach of the obligation is not enforceable by the secular courts to obtain damages or specific performance."

He continued that it was not the courts' role to "palliate the discriminatory effect" of non-issuance of the get on Jewish women any more than it would be appropriate for the courts to get involved in other disputes within religions, such as women not being able to be clergy or same-sex couples not being allowed to marry in a religious ceremony.

Hilton also wrote that even if the courts did force a man to issue a get, it would be regarded as coercion by rabbinical authorities and, therefore, not acceptable because participation in the get must be voluntary.

The three judges reached this conclusion despite the fact that three rabbis testified that Marcovitz had freely given his consent to appear before the rabbinical court in signing the agreement. They included Rabbi Mendel Epstein of New York, author of A Woman's Guide to the Get Process, who appeared for Marcovitz.

In a summary of the case issued by the Supreme Court, it's noted that shortly after the divorce, Bruker, personally and through various lawyers, called on Marcovitz to comply with the agreement, but he refused to do so on the grounds that Bruker's "behaviour since the divorce constituted harassment and an attempt by her to alienate him from his children."

Goldwater said that if the Supreme Court restores Judge Mass' decision, it will have an impact on all clauses in marriage contracts, and not only those of a religious nature. "Family law lawyers would have to be careful about what we write in agreements. You would never again put in any touchy obligations… because you would expose your client to being sued," she told the Lawyers Weekly.

Free Jewish genetic disease screening launched

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —For the first time, free screening for three of the most common Ashkenazi Jewish genetic diseases is being made available through the Montreal Children's Hospital (MCH), as part of an effort by the medical and Jewish communities to raise awareness about prevention.

Anyone can be tested, without appointment, on Nov. 13 from 7 to 9 p.m. at the MCH's Amphitheatre D 182, 2300 Tupper St. It is hoped more such screening and information sessions will be held at different locations, perhaps at community institutions, by the MCH, in collaboration with the Jewish General Hospital and the new Montreal Jewish Hereditary Disease Fund, which raises money for the screenings.

As of last week, the testing is available outside screening days for couples already expecting a child.

With a single blood sample, the test detects carriers of Tay-Sachs, Canavan and Familial Dysautonomia (FD), all incurable. Those with the first two disorders usually die in early childhood; sufferers of FD have a longer average life expectancy through symptom management, but only 65 per cent reach age 30.

The announcement of the initiative was made by Dr. John Mitchell, director of the MCH's genetic screening program at a public panel discussion sponsored by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel and the Montreal Neurological Institute, where it was held.

The MCH is an international pioneer in wide-scale Tay-Sachs screening, primarily in high schools. Since the early 1970s, Mitchell said more than 40,000 Jewish teens have been tested.

The numbers taking the test have dropped off to about 600 a year now, partly due to demographics, but also because of the difficulty today of locating students who do not attend Jewish schools. In addition, not all Jewish schools participate in the program.

In screening for the other two disorders, Quebec, however, is behind Ontario, the United States and Israel where it has become standard practice for doctors to offer these tests to Jewish patients.

The plan is to eventually expand the testing in the schools to include Canavan and FD, he said. As has been the case with Tay-Sachs, the individual student's participation would be voluntary. The Quebec government covers the costs of the Tay-Sachs school screening, and it is hoped that it will also in time support a broader screening program, he said. The goal of the Jewish Hereditary Disease Fund, which was established in July, is to reach all Jewish high school students in Montreal as soon as possible, as well as provide free screening to all persons of childbearing age at risk.

Done privately, these tests cost over $600 per person, and private insurance may cover only a small portion.

The fund plans to reach out to rabbis and doctors to make them more aware of these diseases. The JGH Auxiliary and National Council of Jewish Women are assisting in public education.

The impetus for the creation of the fund was the unexpected appearance of Canavan within a Montreal Jewish family this year.

Recent guidelines issued to doctors by the Society of Obstetrics and Gynecology of Canada and the Canadian College of Medical Geneticists recommend carrier screening for Canavan and FD, in addition to Tay-Sachs, for Ashkenazi Jews.

Speaker Dr. Annette Feigenbaum, a genetic disease specialist at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, said a Jewish couple has a one in 368 chance of having a child affected by the dozen or so genetic diseases prevalent in the community. The most common is Gaucher disease; one in 10 to 15 Ashkenazim is a carrier, she said. She urged governments to recognize that this is a serious public health issue and to provide adequate resources for ongoing screening programs.

For information on the MCH screening, call Elizabeth Hillyer, 412-4418, or email john.mitchell@muhc.mcgill.ca. To reach the Montreal Jewish Hereditary Disease Fund, phone 904-1642.

Quebec committee to look into chassidic schools

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Charley Levy, the executive director of the Association of Jewish Day Schools, has been appointed to a Quebec government committee formed to study the "integration and reasonable accommodation" of children from minority groups within the province's school system.

It's expected that one of the issues the consultative body will examine is chassidic schools that are operating without a permit and whose students are not being taught the province's mandatory curriculum.

Levy told The CJN that the education ministry has told him of three schools that are allegedly not obeying the law: the secondary schools for boys operated by the Skver and Belzer communities, and the Rabbinical College of Canada's high school, which is under Lubavitch auspices. They have a total of about 400 students, he said.

The Skver school, Toldos Yakov Yosef, in Outremont was firebombed over the Labour Day weekend.

Not only are these schools unlicensed, they are not following the Regime Pedagogique. The Education Act stipulates that all children in Quebec from six to 16 years of age must be in a legal school program and taught the mandatory curriculum. This applies equally to schools receiving government funding or not, and to children who are home-schooled.

At the three schools in question, high school-age boys concentrate on religious studies.

These schools are not affiliated with AJDS, but their boys' elementary sections, which are in the same buildings, and the girls' elementary and high schools, have permits and teach the prescribed curriculum, Levy said.

Levy said he has had no personal discussions with those in charge of the three chassidic schools operating without a permit.

The consultative committee was announced Oct. 11 by Education Minister Jean-Marc Fournier and is scheduled to have its first meeting Oct. 30. Chaired by Bergman Fleury, a consulant in education and intercultural relations, it includes representatives of school associations, the Quebec Human Rights Commission, teachers' unions, and the education and immigration and cultural communities ministries.

Besides Levy, the outside experts named are R'kia Laroui, an education professor at the Université du Québec à Rimouski, and Marie McAndrew, who holds the ethnic relations chair at the Université de Montréal.

Fournier said the main aim of the committee is to come up with guidelines and tools on how to "tactfully" reconcile situations where students' religious and cultural beliefs and practices clash with "the values of Quebec institutions." The committee has been also asked to formulate a clear definition of what constitutes reasonable accommodation of religious and cultural differences.

Fournier also alluded to the government's determination that all children get the education set out in the law.

"It is a question of seeing that all youth receive the education to which they have a right while respecting their convictions, but equally respecting our laws, our democratic institutions and our traditions," he said.

"It's a right for them, an obligation of their parents and a priority for the government," he said in a press release.

The committee is slated to issue its report in June.

Levy said he couldn't comment on the committee's mandate or what he would like to see it accomplish because, "at this point, I don't know enough about it… I can't even begin to comment until I see what is on our plate." He expects to learn more at its first meeting next week.

He believes he was named because of his "sensitivity to the Jewish community" and lengthy experience in education.

Before coming to the AJDS in 2003, Levy worked for the former Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal and then the English Montreal School Board for a total of 37 years, including the last three years as the board's director-general.

Last month, Federation CJA said it supports efforts to "regularize" the status of chassidic schools that may not be complying with the law.

"It goes without saying that all Quebecers are bound by the laws of society. The situation is clearly a delicate one involving the religious sensibilities of a particular segment of the Orthodox Jewish community," federation first vice-president Marc Gold said in a statement.

"We are encouraged that the approach taken by the government is one of dialogue and discussion with the institutions and parents and we look forward to a satisfactory resolution of this issue."

It would appear that the government has been aware of the situation at certain chassidic schools for years and tolerated it until francophone media reports about the schools' legality appeared after the Toldos Yakov Yosef firebombing.

In fact, the situation likely existed long before the creation of the education ministry in 1964. The Rabbinical College, for example, was founded in 1941 by the late Rabbi Leib Kramer.

With the exception of the Satmar schools, Werzberger said boys at all the Outremont area chassidic schools are following the provincial curriculum up to age 12 or 13.

After that, there are a couple of years where they are not, he admitted. After 15, the great majority of boys leave Montreal to go to New York, Israel and elsewhere to continue their studies, returning to Montreal when they marry, he said. Only a very small percentage remain in Montreal after 15, he said.

The girls of all ages are following the curriculum "to the letter of the law," except for certain aspects of biology and sex education, Werzberger said.

"There was a deal made [with the government] years and years ago about this," he said.

Werzberger, who is a member of the Satmar community, acknowledged that Satmar schools have not complied fully with the law at any grade level.

"They have refused, and for 35 or 40 years the government knew it, but closed their eyes. Now we have a problem, and I don't know what can be done about it."

Lubavitch fundraiser seeks to make a deal

VANCOUVER — Lubavitch B.C. will combine the art of giving with the art of the deal at its annual fundraiser.

This year's gala evening, to be held Nov. 2, is inspired by the popular TV show Deal Or No Deal, hosted by Howie Mandel. Local talent and reasonable Howie facsimile, Howard Blank, will host Gesheft or No Gesheft (gesheft is Yiddish for business), in which guests can win cash or prizes totalling $50,000, including first class tickets to New York on Cathay Pacific Airways and a luxury condo stay in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico.

To be held in Vancouver's Rocky Mountaineer Train Station, the event features "silver" tickets for $400, which admit one for dinner and yield one game ticket, and "gold" tickets, which admit two for dinner and yield five game tickets. Tickets are tax receiptable.

Lubavitch B.C.'s founder and director, Rabbi Yitzchak Wineberg, expects that "the unique venue and the exciting event will attract between 350 and 400 guests." He added that "members of both the Jewish and general communities… plan to buy tickets to simply support our work."

Proceeds will support Lubavitch work such as study groups, crisis intervention, adult education, immigration assistance, camps and counselling.

For more information, contact Lubavitch B.C. at 604-266-1313.

Anti-Israel slanders mar the CBC's Big Picture

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Is the CBC trying to recreate the bad old days of Counterspin, when discussions about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict devolved into outrageous anti-Israel attacks? That seemed to be the case in a recent episode of The Big Picture with Avi Lewis (CBC Newsworld, Oct. 4).

The show featured the Israeli documentary Hot House, which was followed by a discussion panel. The film, which explored how Israel's high-security prisons have become incubators of Palestinian political activism, was stimulating and insightful. The discussion that followed was not.

The Big Picture's producers said they were striving for a balanced discussion, and even consulted the Canada-Israel Committee about panel members. But while there was, as usual, a diversity of views on the "pro-Israel" side – though M.J. Rosenberg of the Israel Policy Forum and Arik Bernstein, the producer of Hot House, were often critical of Israeli policy and political leaders – there was only the standard monolithically anti-Israel attitude on the other side. Left to make the case for Israel were Moshe Ronen, co-chair of the CIC, and Jonathan Halevi, a former Israeli intelligence officer. On the Palestinian side were Adam Hanieh and Rafeef Ziadeh of the Sumoud Palestinian Political Prisoner Solidarity Group, and Ahmed Hanoud Sholi, described as a former "political" prisoner.

The final panel member was Norman Finkelstein, the author of Beyond Chutzpah: On the Misuse of Anti-Semitism and the Abuse of History. Finkelstein is a well-known anti-Israel extremist, and his inclusion signalled that instead of the "nuanced" discussion moderator Avi Lewis said he was looking for, viewers were in for a more polarized debate.

Ronen tried make the point that Israel has long sought peace with its neighbours. Israel favours the creation of a Palestinian state, but is now confronted with rejectionist political forces, such as Hamas, that refuse to even recognize Israel's right to exist, Ronen argued.

Somehow this moderate, realistic view seemed to irk Lewis, who repeatedly challenged Ronen. But when Finkelstein alleged that for 30 years, the United States and Israel have refused to accept "a two-state solution as understood by the entire international community," Lewis didn't question him, though his statement was utterly false.

Ziadeh made also the extraordinary allegation that "when Palestinian mothers give birth inside Israeli jails, both their legs and hands are handcuffed to the posts." Once again, this extremely serious and damning indictment of Israel was not challenged by Lewis.

In fact, a 2003 report by Israel-based group Physicians for Human Rights (PHR) on the practice of shackling prisoners during medical treatment found only one incident, dating to 1990, in which a Palestinian prisoner had her hands cuffed while giving birth in an Israeli hospital. As a result of PHR's intervention, "the prisoner's restraints were removed and her mother was allowed to sit by her side in the hospital."

Ziadeh distorted a report of a single case of a prisoner restrained during childbirth and made it appear to be a widely practised form of cruel and inhumane treatment in Israel.

It's no wonder that an exasperated Bernstein said to Lewis: "In many ways the talks that the prisoners have [in the film] are a lot more constructive than the thoughts we're hearing from this audience." Lewis agreed: "Yes, I thought so, too. I saw the movie."

Sadly, the irony was lost on Lewis. While The Big Picture's intentions may have been honourable, its integrity was irrevocably damaged by a biased handling of the discussion portion of the program.

Law student helps rape victims

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Instead of taking a year off school to travel the world, as many students tend to do, Sherri Matta decided to spend that time working towards improving the quality of life for Israeli victims of sexual violence.

The 24-year-old Thornhill native, who obtained her criminology and psychology degree at the University of Ottawa, spent the last year living in Israel and working as the resource development intern with the Association of Rape Crisis Centers in Israel (ARCCI).

She said what attracted her to Israel, and wanting to work in Israel, was her experience on a birthright israel trip two years ago and a trip to Poland with her father six months before that.

Matta said she joined her father, a Holocaust survivor, on a trip to Poland for the 60th anniversary of the liquidation of the Lodtz ghetto.

Sheri Matta hiking in Eilat last December

"I had never had a strong Jewish identity before. The combination of both experiences, birthright and the trip to Poland, I did feel very strongly connected to Judaism and Israel and I wanted to spend time there," said Matta who is currently a first-year law student at the University of Western Ontario.

"My undergraduate degree was in criminology and I have always been particularly interested in victims of crime."

She contacted the Jewish Agency and asked to be placed at an organization in Israel that helped victims of crime.

At the ARCCI, which is an umbrella organization for 10 rape crisis centres in Israel, Matta mainly worked on fundraising, since the association is not government funded, and relies heavily on donations.

"ARCCI tries to change social perspectives by awareness raising activities and legislative reform. They deal a lot with members of Knesset and Knesset committees. They do national campaigns and commercials. They run conferences as well," Matta said.

While the association was developed in 1990, the centres from Eilat to Kiryat Shmona have been around since the 1970s, offering aid and support to the thousands of victims of rape and sexual abuse regardless of gender, age, and religious observance. In fact, eight of the centres are regional and serve women in their respective areas, one is designed to address the needs of Arab women, and another is meant for the haredi community.

Services provided by the centres include a national 24-hour crisis line, support and accompaniment during medical procedures, accompaniment during criminal and legal procedures, and organizing education and prevention campaigns.

According to the ARCCI website, reports of sexual assault in Israel have increased in 2005, particularly in cases concerning minors.

Centre received more than 33,000 calls in 2005

Based on their own data, the ARCCI publishes a report each year that details the number of calls received by the centres. The findings suggest that only 32 per cent of callers to the centres report the crime to police.

In 2005 alone, the centres received more than 33,000 calls, of which almost 9,000 were new reports of sexual assault – an 11.4 per cent increase from 2004.

FAST HONOREES: The University of Haifa will be granting honorary degrees to the president and CEO of BMO Financial Group, Tony Comper, and his wife, Elizabeth, co-founders of the group Fighting Anti-Semitism Together (FAST), at a Nov. 19 tribute dinner at the Royal York Hotel in Toronto.

Thirty four per cent of the new cases were reported by 13 to 18 year olds, and almost 40 per cent of their attackers were under the age of 25.

To combat the increase of incidents among youths, ARCCI is focusing on creating education and awareness programs aimed at informing teachers, parents and students, and plans on collaborating with the Israeli Ministry of Education to implement two initiatives.

The association will promote legislation that would make a course about the symptoms of sexual abuse mandatory for teachers, and the ARCCI hopes to organize a campaign for secondary schools to raise awareness about the prevalence of sexual violence among youth.

Matta said that some people don't realize how big a problem sexual violence is in Israel, and the psychological effects it can have on a victim.

"Living in Canada, we take for granted a lot of freedoms, a lot of rights. Israel is a first-world country, it is a western nation, we sometimes don't realize how far back they are," she said, adding that more attention is paid to the religious and political conflict, than social issues.

Matta talked about a woman named Efrat Gil, who was a victim of incest and gang rape on a kibbutz throughout her childhood.

Gil reached out for help from the centres for years. When former director Hilla Kerner-Soliman was working with Knesset members to protect women from sexual violence, she asked Gil to write a letter to the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women describing her experience. She did so – two days before she committed suicide.

"Because [her case] was so extreme and because she couldn't get help from the hospitals, and the centres didn't have the right psychological models in place to help her… she committed suicide," Matta said.

But because of her testimony, June 2005 was the first time that the kibbutz movement recognized the problem of sexual violence in kibbutzim by holding a conference in Tel Aviv to discuss the problem.

Despite this progress, Matta said that within religious circles and the diverse communities, some feel like they would rather deal with it within the community, rather than seek outside help.

"People don't know where to get help. Women and men are very reluctant to get help from centres like these. In the orthodox community for example, if the centres aren't approved by the rabbi, then women and men won't go the centre to get help. They might even be attacked if anyone finds out that they went," she said.

"With Arab communities, they may be reluctant to get help from Israel. Even though the association is independent and non-governmental, there is still some animosity towards anything related to Israel."

Despite the difficult task of opening Israelis' eyes to a widespread problem that many are reluctant to talk about, Matta feels like she is making a difference.

"Having the opportunity to work with women to create such significant change is so rewarding. The women are so strong and independent, and I very much thought of them as my role models. Working with them and feeling like I'm a part of something that is having an effect on Israeli society is definitely very rewarding."

Israeli archeologist to share her findings

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ayelet Gilboa, co-director of the Tel Dor excavation – one of Israel's most important archeological sites – is coming to Toronto next month to lecture at the University of Toronto about the relevance of the findings over the past 25 years.

Gilboa, a professor at Haifa University who has excavated at Dor since 1980, was invited to Toronto by the Canadian Institute of Mediterranean Studies to lecture students and those interested in archeology.

The lecture titled, "Tel Dor in the Iron Age: Sea People, Phoenicians and Israelites," will be held at Bancroft Hall at U of T on Nov. 13 at 6:30 pm and is free of admission.

Although the excavation at Tel Dor is an Israeli project run by Gilboa and Ilan Sharon of Hebrew University, groups from all over the world have participated in uncovering ancient artifacts that help fill in the blanks about the people who lived in the region hundreds of years ago.

Participating universities include the University of California, Berkeley; University of Washington in Seattle; the University of South Africa; the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel, as well as independent American groups.

Ayelet Gilboa

In July, Alex Gropper, the president of the Canadian Institute of Mediterranean Studies at St. Michael's College, led a group of Canadians to Israel to excavate the Tel Dor site.

"Dor is a unique place to try to define the material culture and debate all kinds of cultural phenomena that relate to other Sea Peoples, which many believe were the Philistines' kin," Gilboa said.

She said that the presence of Sea Peoples – a loose confederation of people from the eastern Mediterranean who attempted to invade Egyptian territory around 1200 BCE – in the early Iron Age contradicts what was written in the Bible, that Dor was part of the area conquered by the Israelites, by Joshua.

"According to the Bible, Dor in 10th century BCE, became part of David and Solomon's united monarchy… he divided the kingdom into districts and each of them had a capital. Dor was a capital of the fourth district and the governor there was his son-in-law Ben-Aminadav, spouse of his daughter Tafat," Gilboa said.

"According to the Bible, it was an important place. Apparently it was the main harbour of the Solomonic kingdom."

But, she added the way in which the Israelites conquered the area is one of the most debated issues in history, archeology and biblical interpretation.

"At Dor, there is very clear archeological evidence for an Israelite presence. What we're trying to do is date it because one of the big questions is when actually the Israelites had control of the coast. We are conducting a very expensive and comprehensive dating project by scientific methods, by 14C (carbon 14) dating."

She added that the collaboration with the Weizmann Institute has led to extensive research in the area of sediment analysis and the use of mathematics in archeology.

Gilboa said that it is believed that the Northern Israelite kingdom was annihilated by the Assyrians in late 8th century BCE, but biblical and Assyrian sources only refer to the Galilee, only to parts of Israel, while conquests of the coastal area are never mentioned.

She added that archeological evidence suggests that Dor may have been destroyed earlier in 8th century BCE than originally thought.

"Maybe we have to offer a totally new, totally different interpretation for the end of the Israeli coastal sites. Maybe it was an Aramean conquest, which seems to be a fairly good option, but this is only a possibility that we cannot prove right now. One possible candidate for the bad guy is Hazael King of Aram-Damascus," Gilboa said.

Iron Age Phoenician ceramics

She said that some biblical scholars say that the idea that Judahites – who were deported to Babylon and were eventually allowed to return to the coastal region – returned to an empty land is "a total fiction, a political construct, an imaginative construct destined to serve a very specific political end. Again, this debate of whether it is true that the country was empty in the 6th century or not is ongoing in biblical circles, and has infiltrated into archeology."

Eat, drink and lose weight — really!

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I met Dr. Walter C. Willett at a culinary conference a few years ago when he spoke on a panel on healthy eating and nutrition. Willett is the head of Harvard School of Public Health's Department of Nutrition. I was so impressed that I invested in an audio tape of the lecture. His sensible comments and advice have helped shape my thinking – and my waistline!

I own a well-worn copy of his first book, Eat, Drink and Be Healthy and have been able to expand my nutritional knowledge and shrink my body size, in spite of all the recipe testing that goes on in my kitchen! Thank you, Dr. Willett!

As you can imagine, I was thrilled to learn about the release of his second book, Eat, Drink and Weigh Less: A Flexible and Delicious Way to Shrink Your Waist Without Going Hungry! (Hyperion), co-authored with well-known cookbook author Mollie Katzen. I absolutely love this book and recommend it highly!

Eat, Drink and Weigh Less is based on sound science and represents years of top research conducted by Willett. It blends science, creative thinking and practical applications to empower you to a new "weigh" of thinking.

This is not about what you can't eat, it's about what you can! Eat, Drink and Weigh Less is about making simple changes in your daily diet decisions. These small changes add up to big weight loss.

Willett and Katzen have teamed up to present what they refer to as the "Nine Turning Points" and include more than 100 easy, delicious recipes, requiring very little prep time. Recipes include Whole-Grain French Toast, Pistachio-Currant Halvah No-Bake Nuggets, Balsamic Glaze, Amazing Mushroom Gravy and Kasha Varnishkes.

This flexible diet is not a fad diet – it deprives you of absolutely nothing. The concept is simple but the science behind it is not. If you choose foods according to these nine principles, you'll lose your weight for good. These points include:

1. Eat lots of vegetables and fruits.
2. Say yes to good fats.
3. Upgrade your carbohydrates.
4. Choose healthy proteins.
5. Stay hydrated.
6. Drink alcohol in moderation (optional).
7. Take a multi-vitamin every day.
8. Move more.
9. Eat mindfully all day long.

1. Try to eat five to nine servings of fruits and vegetables each day. They are mostly low in calories and can be enjoyed in generous quantities. Unfortunately, potatoes and french fries are not counted in this category!
2. Don't indiscriminately cut fat. Eat less saturated fat and avoid trans fat, but do eat plenty of unsaturated fat. It can improve levels of cholesterol and other fat particles in the blood, strengthen the heart against dangerous erratic heartbeats and fight the gradual clogging of arteries. Remember, fat isn't any more fattening than other calorie sources.
3. All carbs are not created equal. Shift from more refined carbs (such as white bread) and quickly digested starches (such as potatoes and white rice) to whole-grain, high-fibre foods (such as whole wheat bread and grains such as brown rice), beans and other legumes. They'll give you longer-lasting energy and lower your risk of heart disease and diabetes.
4. Eat more protein from vegetable sources, such as beans and nuts – supplemented by fish and poultry – and less red meat and dairy products. You'll consume less saturated fat and cholesterol and more fibre, vitamins, minerals and healthy unsaturated fats.
5. Stay hydrated by drinking plenty of water and avoid drinking empty calories, especially from sugared beverages.
6. For most adults (but not everyone), a daily glass of wine – or any alcohol in moderation – is actually beneficial to health.
7. Multi-vitamins can't replace healthy eating but are a good, cheap "nutritional insurance" – a way to fill nutrient gaps that can show up from time to time, even in a healthy diet.
8. Getting about 30 minutes of just about any kind of physical activity is an important part of weight control, but it's more than that. Other than not smoking and eating right, it's the best thing you can do to get healthy – or stay healthy – and reduce your risk of chronic disease.
9. Eat a nourishing breakfast, lunch and dinner. If necessary, choose healthy, modest, nutritionally significant snacks between meals to keep your energy even. Eat slowly, savouring and enjoying your food. You'll feel more satisfied and will probably eat less.

The book is packed with interesting sidebars and nutrition notes. Here are just two of many interesting facts in the book:

Skin is in! If you are eating poultry in moderation, you really don't need to skip the skin. Cook it with the skin on to keep the meat moist. You can remove the skin before serving to reduce the amount of calories you're eating, but from a fat standpoint it's okay to eat it because it contains mostly unsaturated fat. Fish skin is okay too.

Cracking the myth: eggs are high in cholesterol but they are also very low in saturated fat and packed with valuable nutrients, including protein polyunsaturated fats, folic acid and other B-vitamins. Research has shown that people eating up to an egg a day are no more likely to have more heart attack or strokes than those who eat less than an egg a week. Enjoy them in moderation – about seven a week. Note: People with diabetes do metabolize cholesterol differently, so for them, limiting intake to two eggs per week makes sense.

Kolel class does more than cook

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A new class offered by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning will explore how Jewish foods nourish Jewish identity.

Titled "Soul Food: Exploring Judaism Through the Kitchen," it runs Thursday mornings for eight weeks beginning Oct. 26 (another session will run in the spring). Suzanne Kaye, who is leading the class, says that participants will assist in "preparing and tasting a wide variety of traditional Jewish culinary delights while learning how food connects Jews around the world."

But rather than being simply a cooking class, Kaye says, each week will feature a conversation about Judaism and food.

Kaye, whose husband is Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, says she remembers always talking at the kitchen table as a young girl growing up in England.

"All the women in my life talked while they cooked. They would perform basic cooking tasks by heart, and have great conversations."

She plans to look at different foods each week. "With challah, for example, we'll talk about the blessings, the meaning of the different shapes, and the fact that a lot of women say prayers while baking challah," she says.

"I'll talk about my own favourite challah recipes, such as whole wheat topped with honey, hazelnuts and walnuts. What a combination of flavours it creates in the mouth."

As well as talking about traditional holiday foods – the last class will feature sufganiyot and latkes for Chanukah – Kaye will also focus on lifecycle events.

"When a baby is born, we have chick peas on the table, and when we are in mourning, we are served lentil soup, because that's the soup that Isaac was given by Jacob."

Every family has its own traditions, she says. "My mother always made strudel for Simchat Torah, and I make Jerusalem kugel for every celebration. Every time we have something to celebrate, there is a Jerusalem kugel on the table.

"For every one recipe, there are 10 others, and I'm hoping that people will share their own recipes. Maybe we'll put together a cookbook at the end of the year."

The class, "is a good excuse for me to do what I love. I love to cook, I love to talk, and I love Judaism. I want to share all that. I want people to learn things about Judaism by being together in the kitchen," Kaye says.

She hopes the class will attract a wide variety of people.

"It's for traditional Jews and those who are new to Judaism. No one will walk away without finding out something they didn't know. Even if they come out with one new recipe, they'll have a lot of information about why food is important to us as a people."

The class takes place in a non-meat kitchen at the the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, she says, so all cooked food will be pareve or dairy, but Kaye will supply meat recipes, she says.

"I'm hoping our cooking smells will waft into the BJCC lobby."

Groups hope new UN head makes body fairer to Israel

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Jewish officials are greeting the selection of Ban Ki-moon as the next UN secretary general with cautious optimism, hopeful that the South Korean foreign minister will use the office to push for fairer treatment of Israel and more equitable application of international human rights standards.

The Security Council endorsed Ban, 62, by acclamation Monday, Oct. 16, choosing him from a field of seven candidates. The General Assembly confirmed him last Friday afternoon.

"If the selection process is any indicator, then the journey of his tenure might be smoother than what we've seen until now," said Rabbi Levi Shemtov, director of American Friends of Lubavitch and Chabad's chief envoy in Washington, who met with Ban and other UN candidates. "There's something smooth, quiet, yet effective about him, and as we get to know him better, I hope it's going to bring us closer to a better and more peaceful world."

Ban will replace Kofi Annan of Ghana, who has a mixed record on issues of Jewish concern. UN observers say it's difficult to predict whether Ban will fare any better, particularly given his reputation as a moderate who prizes consensus building.

Hillel Neuer, executive director of the Geneva-based UN Watch, says powerful groups like the Non-Aligned Movement – an alliance of developing countries that includes the 56-member Muslim bloc – could obstruct any significant changes Ban seeks to implement.

"It would be naive to expect radical change," Neuer said. "The most important decisions are made by member states which are organized into certain powerful alliances."

If the Non-Aligned Movement "wants to play the spoiler role, the secretary general is limited in what he can accomplish," he said.

Neuer's skepticism echoes criticism aimed at Ban ahead of his selection. Some said he was too weak for the UN's top job, chosen more for his inoffensiveness than his potential to reform an organization still tarnished by the oil-for-food scandal and allegations of sexual misconduct by UN peacekeepers.

As Ban emerged as front runner, UN staff reportedly worried that the career diplomat lacked the mettle to take the organization out from under the cloud of controversy that has marred Annan's second term. Annan will step down as secretary general Dec. 31.

Ban earned a BA in international relations from Seoul National University in 1970, and holds a master's degree in public administration from Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government.

Often described as soft-spoken and lacking charisma, Ban rose steadily through the ranks of South Korea's Foreign Ministry, becoming foreign minister in January 2004. His previous postings include New Delhi, Washington, Vienna and New York, and in 2005 he became the first South Korean foreign minister to visit Israel.

"He seems to be a good man and has all the necessary qualifications to be a good secretary general," said Aaron Jacob, associate director of international affairs for the American Jewish Committee, who met with Ban in late September.

At the meeting, Ban was noncommittal in response to AJCommittee concerns about Iran, human rights and reports that UN peacekeepers in southern Lebanon are narrowly interpreting their mandate. Given the Security Council's imminent vote on his nomination, however, that reticence was to be expected, Jacob said.

"He said that he understood our concerns, but understandably did not go into details," Jacob said.

Ban has said he would make reforming the United Nations – a cause close to the hearts of Jewish organizations who say the world body treats Israel unfairly – a top priority. He also has pledged to try to broker a settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The UN charter "was crafted to give the member states ample flexibility in adapting the UN machinery to respond to novel threats in a changing world," Ban told world leaders in September at the opening of the UN General Assembly in New York. "But our tools need sharpening."

Unlike Neuer, who would like the new secretary general to take a bold stance on key issues, many of those who have met Ban believe a more subdued approach – unlike the very public pronouncements that have been a hallmark of Annan's tenure – may be more effective in achieving long-term change.

"Although he doesn't come across as a high-profile champion of causes, he does have a human-rights background and has been able to advance some of those issues behind the scenes," said Shai Franklin, director of international organizations for the World Jewish Congress. "It would be a mistake to dismiss his low-key public style as a lack of interest or resolve on human rights or other issues that we as Jews take very seriously."

"I think he's going to surprise the skeptics," agreed Michael Landau, who heads the Coalition of Orthodox Jewish Organizations of the West Side, a Manhattan-based umbrella group representing 27 groups, and who attended the AJCommittee meeting with Ban. We see Kofi Annan "as being more vocal a leader than Ban Ki-moon, who will speak less and do a lot."

Olmert calls for boycott of Ahmadinejad

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert appealed to the international community on Monday to ostracize Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, saying the world must not "bury its head in the sand" while he calls for Israel's destruction.

"It is inconceivable that… a member of the United Nations continues to be received throughout the world as a legitimate leader while he stands up and says that another UN member state should be wiped off the map," Olmert told a business conference in Tel Aviv.

"We shall never repeat the mistakes of 60 years ago of burying our heads in the sand, ignoring what was being heard then when it was still possible to save lives," he added, in an allusion to the Nazis who killed six million Jews in Europe.

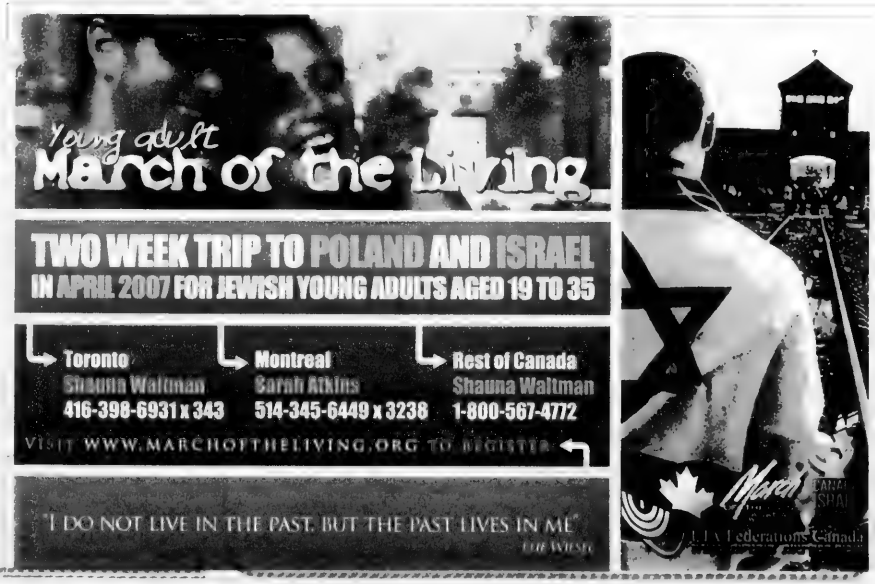
Israel considers Iran to be the greatest threat to its survival, and rejects Tehran's claim that its nuclear program is peaceful. Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called for the Jewish state's destruction, and Iran already has missiles capable of carrying payloads to Israel.

In Israel's sharpest warning yet, Olmert warned last week that Tehran would have "a price to pay" if it does not back down from its atomic ambitions.

Olmert did not specifically threaten to cripple Iran's nuclear program in a military strike, as Israel did 25 years ago in Iraq when it bombed an unfinished nuclear reactor there. But Olmert has been saying that the Iranians "have to be afraid" of the consequences of their intransigence.

Last Friday, at a Tehran rally for Al-Quds Day, held on the last Friday of Ramadan to assert Islamic claims to Jerusalem, Ahmadinejad said Israel no longer had any reason to exist and would soon disappear.

"This regime, thanks to God, has lost the reason for its existence," Ahmadinejad told a crowd of thousands. "Efforts to stabilize this fake [Israeli] regime, by the grace of God, have completely failed… You should believe that this regime is disappearing," he said.



Calls for Gaza re-occupation grow as Israeli patience wears thin

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's patience with the growing menace of the Gaza Strip appears to be wearing thin.

Government and military officials spoke openly Sunday of the need to move fast to stop Palestinian terrorists from turning the coastal territory into a "second Lebanon" threatening southern Israel.

At the heart of the concerns is the so-called Philadelphi route, Gaza's seven-mile-long southern border, which, since Israel's withdrawal of soldiers and settlers last year, has seen unbridled arms smuggling from neighbouring Egypt.

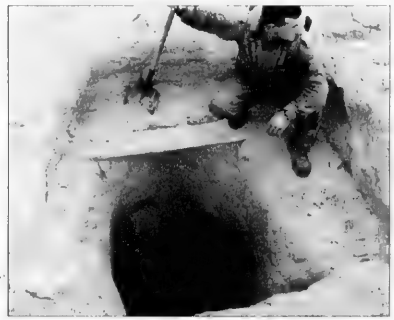
"When we left the Philadelphi route, I said that abandoning it was to open the gates of hell. We might have to find a way to retake it," Industry and Trade Minister Eli Yishai said Sunday before the weekly cabinet meeting.

The call was echoed by at least two other ministers. Already, Israeli forces are carrying out pinpoint missions at the border to uncover and destroy underground tunnels which provide the main conduit for Egyptian contraband.

There is more at stake than the regular rocket barrages by Palestinian terrorists, or the fate of the Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was abducted to Gaza on June 25 in a cross-border raid.

Still recovering from the Lebanon war, Israel wants to stop Hamas and other Palestinian factions from adopting Hezbollah's methods and turning Gaza into a second front against the Jewish state.

"We should prevent Hamas from replicating what happened with Hezbollah in Lebanon. This would have to take place in the coming days or weeks," said Yom-Tov Samia, a retired Israeli army major general who was called up for emergency reserve duty as deputy chief of military forces around Gaza.



IDF units operating along the Philadelphi Route, which separates Egypt from the Gaza Strip, have uncovered at least five weapon smuggling tunnels used to transfer weapons, ammunition and personnel from Egypt into Gaza. [Isranet photo]

He called for Israel to retake Philadelphi and massively expand its buffer zone in order to enable a large-scale tunnel hunt. This would almost certainly entail razing Palestinian homes en masse along the frontier.

"There is no other way to control Philadelphi," Samia told Army Radio. "We must simply go in there, and stay there until peace and quiet reign for 25 straight years."

The question remains whether Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is in a position to order such sweeping moves.

Israelis remember Olmert as the most vocal champion of the Gaza withdrawal, which was masterminded by his predecessor, Ariel Sharon.

But since the Lebanon war, Olmert has made no secret of having to redesign his diplomatic vision. With right-wing parties such as Yisrael Beiteinu widely expected to join the coalition government, the prime minister may have an extra incentive to crack down in Gaza.

Political sources said Olmert would likely convene his security cabinet this week to decide on the option of a major Philadelphi operation. But few expect Olmert to initiate such an operation before his trip next month to the United States, which will include both consultations with U.S President George W. Bush and an appearance at the 75th United Jewish Communities' General Assembly in Los Angeles.

Then again, the timing may be hijacked by the Palestinians.

"The decision to embark on an operation will be made in Israel an hour after a Qassam kills two small children in Sderot," Nahum Barnea wrote in Yediot Achronot, referring to an Israeli town just outside Gaza's border.

Peace with Syria 'worth exploring': Peretz

By HILARY LEILA KRIEGER
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Amir Peretz said Sunday that Israel should explore the possibility of making peace with Syria.

"Israel needs to demonstrate its willingness to make painful concessions if our main interests are [to be] maintained," he said, while stressing that Israel has to be "ready for every scenario of military confrontation" with its neighbor along the northeast border.

Peretz noted that Syrian President Bashar Assad has recently made overtures of peace as well as threats of military confrontation in interviews with the international press.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has dismissed Assad's remarks about peace with Israel and recently declared that he would never give back the Golan Heights.

But Peretz said the government should "consider" each of the Baathist leader's positions. More broadly, he said that Israel needs to be engaging moderate Arab leaders, specifically Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas.

"Israel should not withdraw its hand from diplomatic efforts," he said. "A stalemate is not on the agenda."

At the same time, Peretz, who was speaking to the Jewish Agency's board of governors in Jerusalem, stressed the need for the Israel Defence Forces to take stronger action against the Qassam rockets plaguing the parts of Israel that border Gaza.

In the past, Israel would seek out the party responsible for each rocket before reaction, Peretz said. Now "the IDF will act against all the sources of terrorism without distinguishing between the landlords, so to speak," of the attack.

He also pressed the international community to take seriously Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's threats against Israel, and chastised those groups that have given him a forum for airing his views, which in the past have included Holocaust denial and calls to wipe Israel off the map.

"It is inconceivable that the free world has become an open platform for a person [who] preaches such hate," he said.

Yet he questioned why there should be any conflict between Iran and Israel, noting the countries don't share a border.

"We don't threaten them. We don't negate their right to exist," he said.

Israel Briefs

Olmert seeks talks

Israel called for peace talks with Lebanon. Addressing the opening of the Knesset's fall session, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel made gains against Hezbollah during this past summer's war in Lebanon. He also voiced hope the Aug. 14 ceasefire could be parlayed into peace talks with Beirut. "I want to take this opportunity to call on Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora to meet me, face to face," Olmert said, adding that he hoped for "direct talks that would bring peace to our peoples." Siniora, who has been at pains to offset the postwar appeal of Hezbollah among many Lebanese, rebuffed Olmert's overture.

Katsav should go, poll says

Two in three Israelis believe embattled President Moshe Katsav should resign, a survey published Oct. 20 in Yediot Achronot found. Twenty-four per cent said Katsav, who faces possible prosecution for allegedly raping and sexually harassing several former female coworkers, shouldn't resign, while 10 per cent were undecided. Katsav has denied any wrongdoing.

A female president?

A former Israeli consul-general in New York announced her bid to become the Jewish state's first woman president. Colette Avital, now a senior Labor Party member, said last week she would like to succeed the embattled President Moshe Katsav when he steps down. "We are beginning to put together a campaign staff. In the meantime, I am speaking to Knesset members, because that is the main work," she told Israel Radio. Israel's ceremonial president is chosen by a Knesset vote for a seven-year term. Katsav is scheduled to end his term in 2007, but he's widely expected to resign early, as he is facing possible rape charges. Also touted as candidates are Tel Aviv Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, former Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin, and Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who lost to Katsav in 2000.

Militia used cluster bombs

Hezbollah used cluster bombs against Israel during the Lebanon war, a watchdog group found. In an Oct 19 report, Human Rights Watch said the Lebanese militia fired more than 100 rockets with such bombs into northern Israel. Israel itself has been criticized for using similar munitions against suspected Hezbollah hideouts in the 34-day war.

Iran scuppers swap deal

Iran reportedly bribed the top Hamas leader to prevent the release of an Israeli soldier being held in Gaza. Israel and the Palestinian Authority were recently on the verge of sealing a deal for the recovery of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, but an Iranian delegation paid Hamas' leader Khaled Meshal $50 million (US) to scupper it, Yediot Achronot reported Oct. 19. Meshal, who lives in Syria, has confirmed ordering the June 25 border raid in which Palestinian gunmen killed two Israeli soldiers and took Shalit to Gaza. Meshal has demanded a sweeping amnesty for Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails in exchange for the hostage, but a more limited swap had been agreed upon between Israel and the PA before Meshal scrapped the deal, the paper reported.

Arad missing for 20 years

Israel marked 20 years since air force navigator Ron Arad went missing in action. Schools held commemorative classes and TV and radio stations aired discussions Oct. 16 on Arad, who bailed out of his crippled plane over Lebanon on Oct. 16, 1986. Defence Minister Amir Peretz said Israel would continue its efforts to recover Arad, based on the assumption he is alive. Arad was held by a Lebanese Shiite militia before disappearing.

Google expands in Israel

The leading Internet search engine said it plans to open a research and development centre in Tel Aviv next year. The centre will seek to build partnerships with Israeli universities and institutions, Google said. The firm already has an office in Haifa.

Yuschenko trip a 'hoax'

Ukraine's president won't visit Israel early next month, contrary to reports. A press officer for Viktor Yuschenko told JTA that reports of a state visit to Israel were "a newspaper hoax." Earlier this month, some media reported from Berlin that Yuschenko had announced his upcoming visit to Israel when he and Israel's Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, received a prestigious international award in the German capital. A member of Yuschenko's administration told JTA the visit is likely to take place at a later date, but could not specify when.

Egypt intercepts arms

Egyptian police intercepted a large arms shipment headed for Gaza on Oct. 20. The shipment of some 200 crates of automatic weapons and ammunition raised concerns that Palestinians may be planning to attack a kibbutz on the Gaza border, Ha'aretz reported. The weapons were seized on a truck some 60 miles east of the Gaza-Egypt border, the paper reported. Israel also destroyed a weapons-smuggling tunnel inside a home in Gaza on Oct. 20. Israel was searching for tunnels in Gaza last week and had found 13 as of Oct. 20, the army said.

Jewish groups oppose French railway lawsuits

By BRETT KLINE
JTA

PARIS — Mayer Grosman thinks back to Feb. 2, 1944, all the time.

French policemen and militia members came to his parents' apartment in Paris with orders to take two Grosman males – Grosman, age 6, and his father.

But Grosman's grandfather, whose name was not on the paper, insisted on going in place of six-year-old Mayer. After jewelry and money exchanged hands, the police and militia agreed.

Grosman's father and grandfather, both Polish-born Jews, were taken on a train of the Société Nationale Des Chemins De Fer Français (SNCF), the French national railway, to the Drancy internment camp north of Paris. From there, another SNCF train took them to Auschwitz, where they were gassed.

Grosman's mother took him and his sister and hit the road, hiding in French homes and churches. They survived the war.

Grosman, along with other deportees' families, received a settlement worth about $24,000 from the French government in 2000. But when Alain Lipietz, a French deputy in the European Parliament, whose father and uncle were rounded up and sent to a holding area during the war, won a cash indemnity worth about $77,000 from the SNCF – the railway is appealing the case – Grosman decided he'd sue as well.

"I've never forgotten and never forgiven," said Grosman, 68. "I want recognition, and if my children and grandchildren can receive financial compensation, all the better."

More than 1,000 people, both Jews and non-Jews, have filed similar claim letters since the Lipietz case in Toulouse last summer. Under French law, the SNCF must respond to each letter individually within two months, or legal proceedings begin automatically.

Jewish community leaders in France have come out against claims on the SNCF. They argue that of all the state-run institutions active during World War II – including banks, insurance companies, the education system and many others run by high-level civil servants in prestigious posts – SNCF officials have made the greatest effort to be transparent and truthful in explaining their wartime activities to the French public.

"I understand the families," said Roger Cukierman, head of the CRIF, the umbrella organization of French Jewish groups. "I can feel their pain, but the SNCF has really made an effort to put together exhibits in train stations and other educational tools. If people take the SNCF to court, they could begin doing the same with other state-run groups such as the police, and then why not private companies? I understand the claims, but is this the right path to take?"

CRIF officials and community leaders – such as Serge Klarsfeld, the well-known Nazi-hunter, lawyer and head of the Sons and Daughters of Jewish Deportees from France – have criticized the lawsuits, but the CRIF has taken no official position.

The story gets more complicated. Klarsfeld's son, Arno, was highly praised in 1998 for representing plaintiffs in the trial against Maurice Papon, a Vichy police boss who directed deportations from Bordeaux and went on to a decorated civil service career.

Arno Klarsfeld now represents the SNCF in New York, where deportees' families filed a class action suit against the French railway. He also works closely with Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy on providing legal papers to certain illegal immigrants in France, leading some to charge that his SNCF work is politically motivated.

Neither Serge nor Arno Klarsfeld returned phone calls for this article.

Historians consider the Holocaust the industrialization of mass murder on an unprecedented scale. In France, that industrialization is represented by the SNCF's efficiency in deporting mostly Jews, but also Resistance fighters and even railway workers who joined the Resistance.

"Right after the war, [French president Charles] de Gaulle did a brilliant thing," said Corinne Hershkovitch, a lawyer representing some 500 families who have launched claims against the SNCF. "All the major institutions, the banks, insurance companies, construction companies and so on, were issued a presidential pardon for collaborating with the Nazi regime, in the interest of French national unity. He managed to convince the French people that France had won the war."

Among the groups receiving the pardon, which was political and not judicial, was the SNCF. But now the railway has a dilemma on its hands: there are no class action suits in France, so each of those 1,000 letters could lead to a hearing or trial.

An SNCF official said the letters were being answered individually and not with a form response.

However, SNCF General Director Guillaume Pepy told a Paris TV station earlier this year that "the SNCF board has decided to reject the requests by plaintiffs for cash indemnities to be paid by the railway. The SNCF was requisitioned and was acting under constraints from the Nazi regime. We think it would be unfair and a historical error to find the SNCF guilty for the deportations."

Hershkovitch disagrees.

"This is the continuation of the Papon trial. Papon was the first individual to take the stand, and the SNCF may be the first company," she said.

The SNCF officially opened its wartime archives in 1992. The Bachelier Report, commissioned by the SNCF and written by a private French institute, was issued in 1996 and made available to the public in 1998, revealing some ugly details.

For example, the report noted that the Nazis asked for big barrels of water to be placed in each train car so people could quench their thirst on the trip to Auschwitz.

"French SNCF officials at the time refused to do so," Hershkovitch said. "They said putting barrels of water in each car could easily delay the trains and upset the schedule. They said that their job was to keep the trains rolling on time."

Another lawyer handling more than 400 claims, Avi Bitton, said it was normal to ask for financial reparations, "even though the French quickly link the money with the claimants being mostly Jews, and that is negative.

"The SNCF role was about money from the very beginning," Bitton said. "According to the Bachelier Report, the French railway billed the Vichy government for every person who was deported. And they billed Vichy for the use of third-class cars, but put the deportees in cattle wagons."

"The high-level officials at the SNCF knew exactly what they were doing," said William Wajnryb, who also is suing the railway. "The French police arrested my father on May 8, 1941. The SNCF took him to the Pithiviers camp in France and then to Auschwitz, where he was gassed 48 hours later. They made money by deporting my father."

Wajnryb saw the Lipietz case on TV, and found his lawyer on an American website.

The Lipietz case "opened a breach, and I jumped in," he said.

Wajnryb said he had asked for about $220,000, but is sure it will be refused. He figures that an out-of-court settlement is probably the best solution for everyone, because trials and appeals could take years.

"I never knew my father," Wajnryb said. "I never did anything for him. By making a claim like this, I feel like I'm walking hand in hand with him. I'm bringing him back from the dead across the time barrier. This is how I feel."

Leo Baeck

The Leo Baeck Day School
Thornhill, Ontario, Canada

PRINCIPAL
Atkinson Campus

The Leo Baeck Day School is the only Reform Jewish Day School in Canada and one of the largest in North America. Founded in 1973, our school has grown to over 800 students from Nursery to Grade 8, housed on two campuses in the heart of one of the world's most dynamic and growing Jewish communities.

Our Thornhill Campus, located just north of Toronto, requires a Campus Principal for July 2007.

The Campus hosts 530 students and a committed teaching staff of 50. Our students are prepared to be practicing liberal Jews and to participate effectively in a complex, ever-changing Canadian society. The Middle School is a candidate for accreditation with the International Baccalaureate Organization and we are developing our own IB model for our Primary Years.

The successful candidate will be an experienced school administrator and possess a School Principal certificate or equivalent designation. You will be a person of integrity, a lifelong learner, and one who is passionate about Jewish education. You will have the ability to communicate skillfully and to build a thriving faculty culture. You will report to the School's Director and work closely with our Holy Blossom Campus Principal.

Aspiring candidates should submit a letter of interest, a resumé, and a statement of educational philosophy to:

David Prashker, Director, The Leo Baeck Day School
36 Atkinson Avenue, Thornhill, Ontario L4J 8C9

Scholarly writing rarely makes its way into the hands of the common reader. In Canada, figures like Jane Jacobs, Marshall McLuhan and Mark Kingwell have bridged the gap between academic discussion and the popular imagination. The unlikeliness of this sort of double life for a demanding writer's work is nicely sent up in Woody Allen's Annie Hall, when, in a movie lineup, Allen can no longer bear a neighbour's pontification about McLuhan and presents the philosopher of media himself to offer a down-to-earth rendering of big ideas.

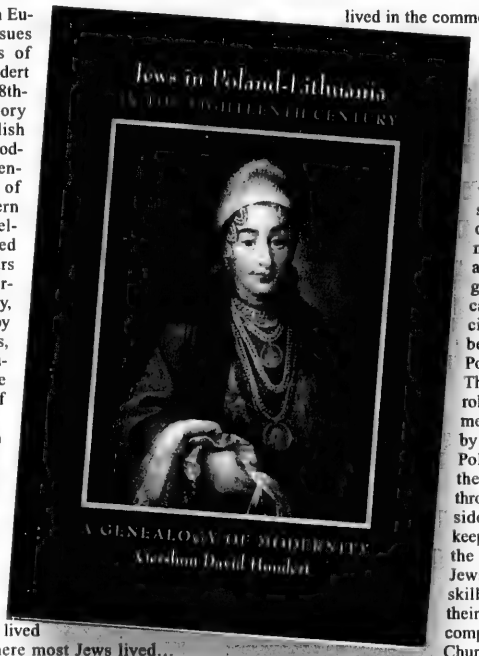
Gershon Hundert's Jews in Poland-Lithuania in the Eighteenth Century is the real thing in scholarly terms – its arguments ride on a career's worth of exploration of other historians' work, as well as on careful gleanings from Polish archives and little-known Hebrew and Yiddish documents. But, like the Allen gag, Hundert's book aims to disarm both the specialist who would aim scholarly work above the head of the average reader, and that reader herself, who might fear her interest and curiosity will not be enough to allow her an entree into scholarly research.

Eighteenth-century Poland offers a tableau against which to explore the rise of Chassidism, the popularization of Kabbalah, the role of Jewish communal leadership, and the impact of the Catholic Church on European anti-Semitism. These issues continue to define discussions of modern Jewish identity, yet, Hundert argues, the formative events of 18th-century Polish and Jewish history remain understudied. Since Polish Jews were not influential in the modernizing Enlightenment movements of central and western Europe, their communal and intellectual life has not been explored with care by mainstream scholars and writers. This quirk in our perception of European Jewish history, Hundert argues, is made stranger by the fact that "the majority of Jews, living in the largest Jewish community" have been relegated to the margins of historians' study of modern identity and faith.

Hundert's book aims to overturn accepted ways of thinking about Jewish history in Europe: "I believe that there are grave distortions in the way scholars have described modernity in Jewish history. Historians have placed too much emphasis on... religious behaviour and belief as indicators of change; too much emphasis on regions where few Jews lived and not enough on the areas where most Jews lived... Because the ancestors of about 80 per cent of world Jewry lived in the commonwealth of Poland-Lithuania in the 18th century, it is they who must be placed at the centre of any understanding of the Jewish experience."



What comes into view, as Hundert shifts the focus of our attention, are a number of unique and precarious entanglements – one could call them dependencies – that existed between Jews and Poles in the 1700s. These include the key roles played by Jews as merchants; the control by Jews of much of Poland's liquor trade; the presence of Jews throughout the countryside as tavern and inn keepers; the reliance, by the Polish gentry, on Jews for management skills and investment in their ancestral lands; the competition between the Church – by far the most anti-Jewish institution of the period – and the Polish nobility for influence over the Polish Parliament's edicts regarding Jewish civil rights.

With an understanding of these formative relationships, based in economics, religious institutions, constitutional change and political allegiances, we can better appreciate Polish-Jewish entanglements as they took shape as recently as the outbreak of World War II.

Hundert also explores how 18th-century Polish Jewry expressed a "positive sense of Jewish identity, the central ingredient of the eastern European Jewish mentalité," by drawing on what he calls "the palette of Jewish culture." This phrase, which recurs in various chapters, is suggestive of such phenomena as Chassidism, Kabbalah, and the organization of Jewish communal life under the leadership of semi-autonomous kahals, all of which can be seen as expressions of Jewish independence and creativity and as subtle forms of resistance to mainstream European trends in favour of assimilation and integration.

Hundert's chapters on The Popularization of Kabbalah and The Contexts of Hasidism offer a short and easily digestible view of material he has explored in greater detail elsewhere. But the average reader will come away from these essays with a far clearer sense of how Chassidism developed, in what ways it is and is not a break from traditional Polish Jewish expressions of faith, and in what way it is responsible for making Kabbalah a "part of the grammar of Jewish culture." (Inadvertently – though this is not a part of Hundert's argument – he helps us understand more recent, much stranger and superficial popularizations of kabbalistic ideas and practice). These subjects remain, in ways, marginal and underground areas of study, but Hundert makes a clear argument for their centrality.

Jews in Poland-Lithuania in the Eighteenth Century is social history at its most satisfying. In its depth of knowledge and reference and its easygoing style, Hundert merges the confidence of scholarly argument with the storyteller's consideration for his audience.

A novel approach to classic kids' tunes

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

When a group of veteran musicians get together the last thing on their minds is probably children. But for Hamilton resident Candace Alper, music and kids go hand in hand.

Alper runs Name Your Tune, a company that creates CDs loaded with personalized kids' songs. More than 1,600 names can be inserted into classic tracks including Old MacDonald, Wheels On The Bus and Head and Shoulders.

"As a parent I wanted to make something different, that people can interact with," she says on the phone from her home. "Most of the other CDs like this are original songs and American."

Instead of crafting originals, Alper "went with the classics." She chose 14 familiar tracks so parents and grandparents could sing along, and, she says, these are songs kids are learning in school.

Alper started Name Your Tune in 2003 after she gave birth to her first child, Hannah. She was working retail at the time, but hoped she'd land a job as a high school teacher. The job never came, though, because Alper decided working from home would suit her and her daughter best. She came up with the idea of making a customized kids' CD after singing songs to her daughter and inserting her name into the lyrics. She knew right away she had a good idea.

Candace Alper and her daughter Hannah

But turning her brainstorm into an actual product was a monumental task. She had to find willing musicians, money to rent a recording studio, and the patience to record hundreds of different names. Luckily, Alper has a lot of musical friends. Her husband is a publicist for Koch records, an international record label, so she had a stable of musicians she could approach.

"The first thing I did was talk to friends of ours that are performers. They all jumped at the opportunity. For the most part this was something they had never done before."

Alper settled on Paul Humphrey, former singer in popular Toronto new wave band Blue Peter, Barbara Vermeulen, a trained opera singer, and Lenny Graf, the only professional kids' musician of the bunch. "Lenny thought it would be a riot. It really takes a certain kind of person to be a kids' performer and they all had a really good time doing it."

Alper and her trio of musicians started recording in 2003, with a list of about 700 names. She culled the list from websites of popular baby names and now she takes requests. "There are a lot of interesting names that have multiple pronunciations," she says, adding that she records every variation of a name. "Rowan can be pronounced different ways, and people are making up names too. You put together Bradley and Logan and you have Brogan."

Adding each name into a song isn't a matter of cutting and pasting. The band has to sing and re-sing most of each track so the name fits properly. "It's a little like getting the caramel into the Caramilk Bar," she says. "They don't just sing the name and try and work it in. They sing enough of the song to make it work. It's incredibly time consuming."

Fortunately, all the hours in the studio are paying off. Alper just opened a Vancouver office in order to facilitate her orders out west and she says she's "selling a lot." While most of her customers are your average parents and gift buyers, she does have a few unusual clients.

"(Actors) Erik McCormack, Debra Messing, (CNN anchorman) Soledad O'Brien," says Alper rattling off her celebrity clientele. This former JCC camp counselor makes it a point to send her CDs to celebs who've recently given birth. Thanks to CNN anchor O'Brien, one record made its way to Brad Pitt.

"A few weeks after I sent a CD to Soledad, she ordered a dozen more for her friends. She said she was interviewing Brad Pitt and if I could Fedex her a copy. She emailed me after, from her BlackBerry and said she put a CD into his hands."

Matt Damon, Adam Sandler, and Lauralee Bell, who plays Cricket on Young and the Restless, all have copies too. "Lauralee wrote back a lovely email. She said my son, who's not much of a dancer has been rocking out for two days to this."

With her CDs selling well, Alper's offering other kid related products on her website, www.nameyourtune.com, such as customized baby blankets, personalized jewelry and other kids' albums of original tunes. But her baby is definitely the Name Your Tune CDs.

"The impact of music for children is undeniable," she says. "When children hear their name in a song it captures both their attention and their imagination since each song is all about them. Each song was chosen for what it can bring to a child - interaction, activity, learning, relaxing - they are all qualities that are important to me."

BOMB IN THE BASEMENT AUTHOR MICHAEL KARPIN OPENS JEWISH BOOK FAIR

Michael Karpin, Israeli author of The Bomb in the Basement: How Israel Went Nuclear and What That Means for The World opens the 30th annual Jewish Book Fair in the Leah Posluns Theatre on Saturday, Nov. 4, 8 p.m. Tickets to his talk, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, are $10.

The book, published by Simon and Schuster, is a timely examination of Israel's nuclear capabilities and why they have never set off the world's alarm bells as have those of Iran and North Korea.

Unlike those rogue nations, Israel never signed the nuclear non-proliferation agreement and has always maintained a policy of ambiguity about its nuclear program, Karpin notes. Also, Israel has never heated up regional relations by making idle boasts and references to its nuclear option, which it views not as an offensive tool but as a last-resort deterrent against annihilation.

Authors featured at the book fair (Nov. 4 to 12) are Rafi Aaron, Howard Akler, Anne-Marie Baila Asner, Bonnie Burstow, Bernice Eisenstein, Norene Gilletz, Bill Gladstone, Gershom Gorenberg, David Pryce-Jones, Kathy Kacer, Elliott R. Katz, Kati Marton, Lorne Miller, Ruth Panofsky, Sarah Chana Radcliffe, Marla Shapiro, Simcha Simchovitch, Harold Troper and Gil Troy.

Also, Eugene Orenstein speaks in Yiddish and English about Sholem Aleichem – whose legacy, along with that of I. L. Peretz, is celebrated in a separate event by Nathan Garnick, Jeannette Stein, Faye Zeidman and Paul Mathew.

For tickets and information, please phone 416-636-1880 ext. 368.

College Street's immigrant/Jewish past celebrated in a book of essays and photos

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

College Street is to Toronto what St. Lawrence Street is to Montreal – a vital thoroughfare that reflects the ethnic and cultural diversity of an ever changing, pulsating city.

A newly published book, College Street – Little Italy Toronto's Renaissance Strip (Mansfield Press), edited by Denis De Klerck and Corrado Paina, explores this colourful artery through the medium of thoughtful essays and nostalgic photographs.

One chapter, The Jewish Experience, charts the important historic Jewish presence on College Street.

It is written by Richard Menkis, a professor of modern Jewish history at the University of British Columbia, and Harold Troper, a University of Toronto historian and the co-author of that Canadian classic, None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe 1933-1945.

Until about World War I, as they point out in their lucid essay, the vast majority of Jews in Toronto lived in the densely populated St. John's ward, bordered on the east by Yonge Street, on the west by University Avenue, on the south by Queen Street and on the north by College Street.

The area north of College was a bastion of Anglo-Protestant institutions that, they say, "might just as well been a million miles away" from the neighbourhoods familiar to Jews.

Louis Rasminsky

But after 1918, there was a shift and College Street and environs replaced St. John's Ward as the heartland of Toronto's Jewish community.

By that point, Jews were the largest non-Christian minority in Toronto, and they retained this status until the end of World War II.

Pulsing with activity, College Street, rolling westward from Spadina Avenue and including such streets as Major, Markham, Euclid and Palmerston, morphed into the centre of Jewish Toronto.

Among its residents were J.B. Salsberg, the trade unionist, politician and raconteur; Sammy Luftspring, the professional boxer and winner of the Canadian welterweight title in 1938; Nathan Phillips, the alderman who would be Toronto's first Jewish mayor; and Louis Rasminsky, the Harbord Collegiate graduate who, in 1961, became the first Jewish governor of the Bank of Canada.

Holocaust survivors gravitated to the College Street hub, but as the 1940s and 1950s wore on, Jews moved northward to Davenport, St. Clair West and beyond.

Jewish institutions and synagogues, and Jewish-owned shops, cafes and restaurants joined the exodus.

College Street is all but bereft of Jews today. Italian, Portuguese, Chinese and Vietnamese immigrants have taken their place and made their respective contributions to what is arguably Canada's most cosmopolitan metropolis.

Yet, as the authors observe, a new generation of Jews – young, upwardly mobile professionals – is returning.

"Perhaps College Street may not only have a Jewish past," they write. "Maybe it has a Jewish future as well. And perhaps, then, it may yet be too soon to say kaddish for the Jewish presence on College."

Exactly.

Fan learns about being Jewish from Streisand

By KRYSTYNA LAGOWSKI
Special to The CJN

When Barbra Streisand rose up through the stage at Toronto's Air Canada Centre last week, an uncontainable surge of raw happiness bubbled up inside of me and I squealed, "Bar-bra." And so did 19,000 Streisand fans who just happened to be there with me.

To most of her fans, Streisand is a musical phenomenon with a golden throat, whose magnetic presence lights up every inch of film she inhabits. That she is also one of the most visible, in-your-face Jews in the entertainment business, is secondary.

But to me, Barbra Streisand is my rabbi.

When I was 12 years old, my mother took me to see the movie Funny Girl, in which Streisand portrayed Jewish comedic songstress Fanny Brice. Completely taken by Streisand's charms, I strolled my high school halls sporting winged black eyeliner and long tapered fingernails, and spoke with my best Brooklyn accent.

This was in the 1970s, in Oakville. At home, I would answer the phone with "Hello, gorgeous." My speech was peppered with Yiddishisms like meshugene.

I didn't know just how much I really had in common with Streisand. I didn't know I was actually Jewish.

Our family was Polish Catholic, my parents having emigrated from Poland after World War II. My first brush with anti-Semitism came when Ted Lewiecki, a Polish Catholic family friend, was having Christmas dinner with us. "She is just like all those ugly Jewish girls I went to school with," he sneered.

Then I put Streisand's Christmas album on the family stereo. "Now, if Barbra Streisand could sing a song like that," he said, pointing to the stereo where Streisand was belting out Ave Maria, in Latin, no less. I giggled and told him that it was Streisand. He turned beet red and ignored me for the rest of the evening.

I was only 15 and unaware of my Jewish heritage. I also didn't know what anti-Semitism was.

Then, a little over 10 years ago, I found out my mother was a Holocaust survivor who had sat on her secret for more than 40 years. That meant I was Jewish. It's safe to say most of what I knew about being Jewish was from being a Streisand fan.

Funny Girl was as much about Streisand as it was Brice. Streisand refused to change her name or her nose to fit convention. (Ironically, Brice was born Fania Borach, and had plastic surgery – as Dorothy Parker famously put it, "she cut off her nose to spite her race.")

Right away, I learned that to be Jewish is to be different, and that it was not only okay to be different but you could also win an Academy Award for it. I watched Streisand serenade former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir on Israel's 30th birthday, and saw how powerful Jewish women could be. Where else, in the 60s and 70s, was a woman the leader of her country?

In Yentl, I saw how Jewish women were once forbidden to study Talmud. Now Jewish women study Talmud and are respected as rabbis and scholars.

I learned about Jewish generosity, giving back to community, in Streisand's charitable foundations, and concerts where ticket sales go to causes like the Human Rights Campaign Foundation.

Streisand received death threats before her June 1967 open-air concert in New York's Central Park, just weeks after Israel's Six Day War. The show went on. In 1996, the now-defunct George magazine quoted her as saying, "I'm a liberal, opinionated Jewish feminist – I push a lot of buttons." Recently, she made headlines around the world for cussing out a heckler at her New York concert who objected to a skit in which she hosted a U.S. President George W. Bush imitator onstage to whom she posed questions.

Here at Toronto's Air Canada Centre, 19,000 Streisand fans had to pass through metal detectors one by one. Bottled water had to be poured into cups before it could enter the stadium. It may be de rigueur south of the border, but unusual in Canada. Is this the price of being a liberal, opinionated Jewish feminist?

I hope not.

Mother of fatally ill child writes a book

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

We have written about Jacob Schwartz before. He is an incredibly handsome child, with an infectious smile.

Jacob is now nine years old. He has Canavan disease, a genetic disease found predominantly, although not exclusively, in Ashkenazi Jews. He cannot see, talk, lift his head, move or eat. Since he can't swallow, fluid has to be suctioned frequently from his throat. Seizures and bouts of pneumonia have weakened him.

Canavan disease is a neurological birth disorder in which the white matter of the brain degenerates into spongy tissue riddled with microscopic fluid-filled spaces. It causes imperfect growth or development of the myelin sheath, the fatty covering that insulates nerve fibres in the brain.

As the gene for the disease is recessive, both parents of a child with the disease must be carriers of the gene mutation. There is a one in four chance with each pregnancy that the child will be affected with Canavan disease. There is no cure, and death usually occurs by the age of 10.

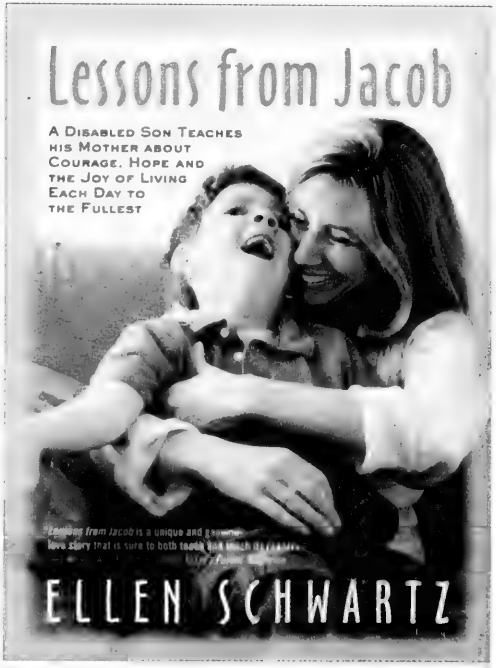
That smile on Jacob's face surely comes from the incredible care and loving he gets from his family – parents Ellen and Jeff, siblings Beverley and Ben, grandparents, numerous aunts, uncles, cousins and friends.

She focuses on what she considers the lessons she has gleaned from Jacob

Mother Ellen manages to juggle caring for Jacob, running a household and caring for her two other children, teaching fourth grade at Eitz Chaim's Viewmount branch, and running Jacob's Ladder, an organization to raise awareness and funds for Canavan and other genetic neurodegenerative diseases.

One might expect, even forgive, her being resentful, bitter or depressed. Sometimes, she acknowledges, she is. But most of the time, she focuses on what she considers the lessons she has gleaned from Jacob.

She has described those lessons, and her life, in a new book, Lessons from Jacob (Key Porter), which was launched at the beginning of October.



Like all parents, the Schwartzes expected to have a normal, healthy child. At first, everything appeared fine. But when Jacob failed to meet developmental milestones, they became worried and took him for evaluation. That's when they got the devastating diagnosis.

"It hit us like a bolt out of the blue," Jeff told The CJN in a previous interview.

Nevertheless, the family adjusted, with a lot of support from their families and friends. They sent Jacob to school, first to Play and Learn, a program integrating special needs children with regular students, and then to Beverley School, a school for children with developmental or physical disabilities.

Since he can hear, great efforts are made to expose him to music, and to the sounds of other children playing and talking to him. His response is always happy smiles.

Ellen Schwartz has a firm philosophy: Jacob is part of their family, and where they go he goes. During the summer, the whole family, including Jacob, all the paraphernalia he needs and his caregiver, went to a family cottage in the country. There, he enjoyed the sounds, smells and ambience of a holiday, and being part of a large, enthusiastic family.

Although Ellen projects a positive image, Lessons from Jacob doesn't flinch from talking about the other side of the situation: the constant worry; the lack of sleep, since she and Jeff alternate a night of sleep with a night of duty – changing Jacob's position in bed, changing his diaper, suctioning; the fear of his frequent illnesses.

She speaks movingly about the time she called a good friend for a "pity party." The two went for a long walk, and she cried and screamed out her frustrations, exhaustion, the unfairness of everything.

Sometimes, during Jacob's frequent hospitalizations, she would jog the eight kilometres from their home to the hospital, crying all the way.

She recognizes what will inevitably happen to her little boy, but she chooses to live day by day, enjoying his happy moments, admiring his patience, his joy in playing in the water or his bath, his enjoyment of music, and just loving him.

The family formed Jacob's Ladder: The Canadian Foundation for Control of Neurodegenerative Disease in 2001 to help fund research into diseases such as Canavan, as well as encouraging genetic screening. A simple blood test can determine if someone is a carrier of the gene mutation or if a fetus has the disease.

Fundraising efforts include this year's Jacob's Ladder Giving Gala, scheduled for Nov. 5 at the Liberty Grand, from 10 a.m. until 2 p.m. Tickets are $25 each, or $100 for a family of five. Activities include Sony Playstation 2, Spin Master Toy Zone, carnival games, clowns, magicians, balloon making, dancers and inflatables, as well as performances by Kayla, Sho Mo & the Monkey Bunch, Craig Douglas, and the Stylamanders, and a visit by several residents of the Toronto Zoo.

Lessons from Jacob is on sale at local bookstores.

THE CONVENIENCE I WANT

We have the staff and the services to make everything easier and more enjoyable.

It's better here ... great meals and activities, housekeeping services and personal assistance when it's required. We've thought about everything, so you don't have to.

"Some days the house was too much to handle. Now I have the help and support to make life a joy, not a chore."

Join us for a personal tour & lunch, and we will show you what makes us a classic!

PANAMA – THE NEXT GOLD RUSH!

Once upon a time there was a small river, one of the many in Canada's Yukon Territory. Nobody would ever have known its name but for one fact. In 1896 GOLD was found in the KLONDIKE River. When the three prospectors discovered it they had no idea they would set off one of the greatest gold rushes in history. With cries of "Gold! Gold! in the Klondike!", an army of hopeful goldseekers, headed north toward the vision of riches to be had for the taking.

The GOLD RUSH of the KLONDIKE has been referred to as THE LAST GRAND ADVENTURE! That is until 110 years later – when we discovered the potential of PANAMA!

That was 1896 – 2006 the equivalent is PANAMA! Almost everyone has heard of Panama – if not the country certainly the PANAMA CANAL. Just like our nemesis the Klondike - Panama is about to explode. Investors and retirees are flocking to Panama, not just for the balmy climate and affordable lifestyle, "THERE IS GOLD IN THEM THERE HILLS!!!!"

Eleonora Michailov is a well known realtor in Toronto, and she is sure that Panama is the most remarkable place for investment now. Just like the prospectors in the Klondike the first to arrive made the largest incomes. The pioneers who are investing in Panama now are reaping great rewards.

Let us share an interview with Eleonora Michailov:

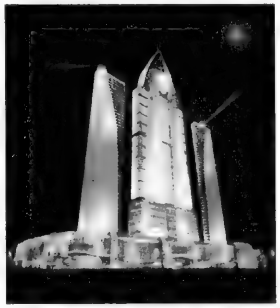
"Eleonora, what are your predictions on the astounding profits from investments in Panama properties based on?

"I just want to mention that these are not predictions, this is a reality. We came to the Panama real estate market one year ago. Those who broke new ground were able to at least double their investments. Here is an example: in March one of my clients purchased a one bedroom suite, 100 square meters for $248,000. His first installment was 10% of the total purchase price, which was $24,800. The unit was sold 5 months later for $340,000, this was before the second installment was due. After all service fees were paid, our client received $75,000 plus his initial deposit. Could you tell me what legal business is able to give such a great profit?

We have several similar examples. And this gives us the right to state: there is no alternative market at the present time that is giving our clients even close to the same rate of return. Even if we are extremely cautious, estimating the challenges of current investments, we could talk about 50%-100% annual profit."

The numbers you mention are very impressive and the profit margins are very generous, but isn't $250,000 a lot to pay for a one bedroom suite? Aren't there lower and more attractive prices?

"Everything depends on what you are looking for. For example: a pensioner is interested in the Panama lifestyle, the wonderful climate, first class medical care and fantastic service at every turn all of the things we all want in our "golden years". In this case you can find units with a much lower price, because you are buying for your own use and not just for investment. However, when we speak about the investment potential and your objective is to make healthy profits, you have to invest your money into prestigious properties. Only this type of housing brings you the intended effect. The projects, such as Los Faros De Panama, Ice Tower and Trump Ocean Club, are situated in the most fashionable areas of Panama City and are in great demand. The prices for them heat up, outpacing the construction time. You can judge the level of these projects yourself. Take for example Trump Ocean Club. A huge building made in the form of sailing ship. It is reminiscent of a famous building in Dubai. Their residents automatically have the membership to a yacht club, 6 star hotel, world renowned SPA, the International Trump Casino and one of the most beautiful islands off the coast of Panama belongs to this project. The owners of this condo will be brought to the beaches of this island by high speed boats. To make the picture complete, I must add that on arrival in Panama the owners will be taken from the airport by special limousine in true TRUMP style!



One cannot but agree that all this costs money. Trust my experience that the price will grow, despite that it already up for 30 % from the initial price list.

Those who were the first were the winners as usual, but now those who will occupy or buy several apartments which are left will not lose. For the successful resale of the apartments of such level - three or four months will be quite enough. You must understand, clearly we are not offering a one time deal. The Real Estate boom which has begun in Panama will continue until the prices become stable. The predictionas are that will take no less than five to seven years. That means that at least in the course of this term you can invest money and earn money."

How can you explain such an unexpected splash of interest to this country?

The government of Panama is going to approvea tremendous plan of the Canal expansion. Billions of dollars will be released, very serious investors are involved in this plan, and the labor market grew up considerably. No other country of this region experienced such a rise. Besides, it is necessary to take into consideration that Panama is an offshore zone with magnificent legislature which strongly protects investments.

Also, an unprecedented housing construction is going on. In the near future there will be a release of one of the most important projects in the business centre of the capital city – Trump World Centre. We are accepting deposits already which will give the opportunity to our clients to buy apartments in these projects. As well we have the exclusive rights to sell apartments in the other projects which provides our clients with great advantages. Very shortly we'll be announcing another elite project – " Armani ". Based on Panama's booming industry, we definitely are at the right place at the right time. Our clients are on our team. When I'm saying "we" I mean particularly this team united by the trust in success. By the way, some of those who have managed to buy apartments and sell them in a short time, used there profits and went even further. They bought pieces of land and became developers themselves. Now they have provided us with the exclusive right to sell the property built by them.

Panama City is the home to many cultures. Many of the builders and developers in Panama are from the Jewish Community. There is a very strong Jewish Community with five Synagogues in Panama City.

No matter how much one talks about Panama - to feel the atmosphere, soak up the unique and surprising aura and energy which gives new strength and youthfulness, is only possible by experiencing it first hand. There, in the connection between two great oceans lies Panama! Our next tour has been scheduled for the 13th of November, and there is still a chance to order tickets.

Raptors too much for Maccabi this year

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

One year ago, Maccabi Tel Aviv became the first international team to beat an NBA squad in more than 15 years when it defeated the Toronto Raptors in a pre-season game on Anthony Parker's last-second heroics.

Last Thursday night, Maccabi, Israel's dominant basketball team, came into the Air Canada Centre eager to repeat history, and to play against Parker, their former teammate and leader, in his new role as a Raptor small forward.

But this year, they couldn't get it done without him.

Parker, the Euroleague MVP in 2005 and 2006, played for Maccabi for five seasons and led them to the 2005 Euroleague championship. Known as the best player not playing in the NBA, he was signed by the Raptors this past summer.

Despite his return to North America, the American hoopster remains an Israeli fan favourite and still commands the respect of his former team.

"I'm looking forward to it," Yaniv Green, Maccabi's third-year centre, said before the game. "We hope we'll [get] the same result we did last year. It's gonna be harder without him."

It was, although the Israeli team gave the Raptors a bit of a scare for the first two quarters.

The atmosphere at the ACC was electric. Maccabi fans hung Israeli flags off handrails in every corner of the arena, and when the national anthems were sung prior to the game, Hatikvah was echoed back energetically by the highly partisan pro-Israeli crowd. Chants of "Ma-cca-bi!" could also be heard throughout the game.

The support seemed to inspire Tel Aviv to a strong start, and they came out playing a high-tempo, focused team passing game.

Sparkplug point guard Will Bynum, in his first season with Maccabi, breezed by Raptors defenders for most of the first half, making acrobatic passes, opening up room for his teammates and penetrating the Toronto zone for easy lay-ups.

Noel Felix, Maccabi's recently acquired 6-7 power forward, further thrilled the pro-Maccabi crowd with several slam dunks, while forward Simas Jasaitis seemed unable to miss from three-point range.

With only four minutes left in the second quarter, Maccabi had opened up a 13-point lead on the stunned Raptors.

But that was as good as it would get for the Israeli team.

Raptors coach Sam Mitchell made adjustments, and by halftime, Toronto had stormed back to narrow the gap to just two points, making the score 55-53 in favour of Maccabi.

But the second half was all Raptors.

At one point in the third quarter, Toronto went on a 20-2 run, outpacing a visibly tired Maccabi side that committed 12 fouls and looked to be feeling the effects of its long, pre-season travel schedule. Just two nights prior, the team lost 93-67 to the Cleveland Cavaliers.

Throughout the second half, Tel Aviv coach Nevan Spahija kept shouting at his players to "Play defence!" Despite Spahija's efforts, his team continued to lose its cohesiveness in the face of a re-energized Raptors squad that dominated the rest of the way and eventually won 118-84.

At game's end, Parker ran over to his former team and hugged Maccabi coaches and players.

He said he was glad to put the emotional reunion with his old team behind him.

"It started with the Israeli national anthem. I haven't heard it in so long, but I was humming along. That was special for me," he said.

"It was weird to see those guys... and me not being on their side. It was great [playing in Israel]. They really rally around you, and for an American going overseas, I think it's the best place to be, both in terms of basketball and social life. It's a great culture."

They weren't making any excuses, but Maccabi players said they were happy to be done with their North American tour and ready to head back home.

"It felt good to play NBA opponents to help us prepare for the Euroleague," Felix said.

"We got a good workout from them. I really didn't expect that," said Chris Bosh, the Raptors' star forward.

Coach Mitchell concurred. "You gotta give them credit. But I feel better than I did this time last year," he said with a grin.

Maccabi headed back to Israel the following day to prepare for their Euroleague home opener Oct. 26 against Spain's Unicaja Malaga.

The danger of curbside tfillin-pushers

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Two twentysomething males walk through a pedestrian mall in a chassidic neighbourhood (in Israel, Canada, New York). The first – his kippah in plain view, tzitzit swinging side-to-side – clearly reveals that he is an Orthodox Jew, while the other, in jeans and a baseball cap, discloses no outward details of his faith.

New Views

A chassidic man, black hat and all, stands on the curb with a pair of unwrapped tfillin in his hands. He asks the second stroller – and only the second stroller – "Have you made the blessing over the tfillin today?"

What happens next?

Some possibilities:

• The walker of ambiguous faith could admit that he had not yet prayed or donned tfillin – maybe he hasn't even tried them on in years. "Sure," he replies. "I'll put them on and say the blessing."

• "No," the angered walker barks. "I don't believe in God, and I don't want anything to do with your prayers." When asked by the ever-smiling Chassid to explain his position, he says, "How can I possibly respect the demands of a God who for so long has disrespected and betrayed his own people?"

• "What do you think?" the walker snaps back. "Do you think I put on tfillin today?" The Chassid, now put off and in uncomfortable territory, stammers that he's not quite sure whether his interrogator has performed the mitzah. The walker takes off his baseball cap, revealing a knit kippah. "If I wasn't wearing my hat, would you still have asked me whether I had put on tfillin?" "No, probably not," comes the reply.

"Kiruv," the term used by Orthodox Jews to define the movement to bring other Jews into their fold, is a tricky business. It is, by all accounts, an attempt to right a wrong. Kiruv-inclined Orthodox Jews firmly believe that they (and only they) practise the correct form of Judaism – based on (some) tradition, the 613 commandments set out in the Bible, and a long list of talmudic and rabbinic interpretation.

In their minds, if you aren't putting on tfillin every morning, you should be. If you don't uphold kashrut to the level they deem sufficient, you're getting it wrong. And they want to help you fix the problem.

The fact that this dangerous message often gets lost in those early, let's-put-on-tfillin moments is not particularly alarming. In fact, for those Jews previously unaffiliated with Orthodoxy who want to give tfillin a try, the offer to don them is a rather kind act – and an opportunity that might not have arisen otherwise. Maybe, the kiruv community speculates, the tfillin-tryer will enjoy the experience enough to want to learn more. And in the broaden-your-horizons 21st century, there's no harm in introducing new concepts to the previously unaware.

Still, the belief that everyone should be putting on tfillin is precisely what puts off the man who has absolutely no interest in indulging the Chassid. He has spent years coming to the conclusion that Orthodoxy is not his way (there may be no religious way for him, or he may enjoy a different religious experience), and the rude Chassid – with his undertones of right versus wrong– presents an unpardonable intrusion. But that risk never keeps the Chassid from asking his question. If unsure, he prefers to err on the side of caution – the possibility of insult is far outweighed by the prospect of a conversion initiated.

The tfillin question can open the door to a new and potentially positive experience. But it can also pit one form of Judaism against another for the person who has already come to a vastly different conclusion than the Chassid.

As well, the query may be a slap in the face for the Orthodox Jew who keeps the same mitzvot as the Chassid but happens to prefer different clothes

You never know what might be lurking underneath a baseball cap.

Apple-glazed carrots

A great accompaniment for roast chicken.

1 tblsp pareve margarine
1 16 oz. package peeled trimmed baby carrots
1 c unsweetened apple juice
1 tsp honey
1 tblsp minced green onion tops

Melt margarine in large skillet over medium-high heat. Add carrots; sauté until carrots begin to brown slightly, about 8 min. Add apple juice and honey; bring to boil. Reduce heat, simmer until carrots are tender and liquid is reduced to glaze, stirring occasionally, about 15 min. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Transfer to bowl. Sprinkle with green onion tops and serve.

ISRU CHAG: Jews at a shul in Jerusalem's Mea Shearim neighbourhood celebrate the renewal of the Torah readings for the coming year. Unlike in the Diaspora, Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah are celebrated on the same day in Israel. As the following day isn't a yom tov, the celebration that began the previous evening with dancing with the Torah is extended to the next day for what's known as an "isru chag" – which literally means "the binding of the festival." The barber shop

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

"A man never forgets his boyhood barbershop." So writes Craig Marberry, the author of Cuttin' Up – a book on conversations in barber shops across America – places he describes as somewhere we celebrate "the laid-back fellowship of men" and "go to be among ourselves, to be ourselves, to unmask."

URBAN WRITER

My first visit to the barbershop was a memorable one, in a traumatic sort of way. My hair flowed with long brown curls – a childhood mane. I had become very attached to my hair and had no interest in losing it – perhaps because, as the black "barber shop sages" say in Marberry's book, "the top of your head is where your soul lies."

The image I see when I look back at that day is of three well-coiffed men struggling to hold me down as I fought like a lion, using all the strength my tiny three-year-old arms could muster up and all the wriggling power my miniscule body could produce. In the end, however, the barbers won and tears rolled down my cheeks. I exited the shop hoping never to return. Alas, I wasn't a man yet, but I had been unmasked.

My oldest friend, Dave Nefesh Middleman from Michigan, told me his hair-cutting memories. However, his barbershop was at home.

"Every couple of months, when I was a kid, old Mr. Silver came to our home to give my dad, my brother and I haircuts in our basement. He always had a smile for us and things to say in his mild Yiddish accent. Mr. Silver dressed quite plain but always very neat. He was fairly bald but did have some silver patches of hair left. I'll never forget Mr. Silver paid close attention to the way I liked my bangs, nice and long until just above my eyebrows. I always appreciated him for that. The rest of my head was pretty closely shaven, the way my dad would insist, and that was fine for me.

"Yes, those were the days. Memory traces of a time long past. And while it is now more than 30 years later, those remnants are no less visible in my memory, of a time when the men in the household came together – relaxed, chatted and sometimes laughed – around this subtle form of pampering and body care."

A barber shop, according to Marberry, is the place we go for "a haircut, of course, but we also come to connect, to converse among our brethren." Ain't that the truth. When I was a teenager, I frequented a shop around Sheppard and Bathurst. The Italian owners seemed Jewish by osmosis and had an intimate knowledge of many Jewish community members after shearing and trimming thousands of their heads and beards.

I recall sitting in a red, beaten leather chair and eavesdropping on the chitchat and tittle-tattle of the Morrises and Marvins sitting next to me – discussing their BB days (before baldness) and bantering on about shul members, neighbours and business partners. Often, I knew the person gossiped about and would learn some pretty hairy stuff about our community – scandalous things way too steamy for these pages.

There is nothing like taking your son to the barber for the very first time. Marberry writes, "I know a boy's first haircut is a daddy thing… it's a rite of passage and a whole ritual surrounds it."

Miriam and I have decided we will wait a year before we take Noah River to the barber. For now, however, we'll have to do some serious research on which barber will most suit our Little Man's needs. The last thing we would want to do is choose the wrong barber. It's like choosing the wrong mohel. The memories could be harrowing.

(Dedicated to Jake, who at almost two had his first haircut, and sat there bravely and quietly throughout.)

TOGETHER WITH ISRAEL

A salute to our community and its volunteers

Together With Israel

The unrelenting resolve, dedication and spirit of Jewish Toronto's remarkable volunteers never fail to amaze and inspire us. Their generosity – both financially and in terms of their time – is second to none throughout the Diaspora. Toronto was the world's first Jewish community to launch an Israel Emergency Campaign and the first to send dollars to Israel as soon as the war broke out, none of which could have happened without the leadership shown by our community's volunteers and donors.

Following the war, our volunteers made their way to Israel aboard UJA Federation solidarity missions – at their own expense – to let Israelis know they are not alone. Many not only visited Israel but rolled up their sleeves to help wherever they could. Our reputation as a generous, caring and compassionate community is well known throughout the world, and it's all thanks to our volunteers.

We are truly one big family and a family as big and determined as this one is destined to achieve greatness. We are both so proud to be chairs of UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 where we are witnessing, firsthand, this outpouring of support and generosity from everyone. Our community's generosity truly defines tzedakah.

Voluntarism is the engine that drives UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and makes it – year in and year out – one of the world's most successful non-profit organizations. Our community's selfless, tireless and dedicated volunteers comprise the foundation of our organization and bind our community together as one. Without this group of visionaries, UJA Federation would be hard-pressed to touch so many people and change so many lives.

This year, in particular, we saw the effects of our community voluntarism at its very best as Jewish Torontonians came together for Israel during and following its 34 day battle with Hezbollah. I am so proud that we, as a community, met the challenge and once again answered the bell when our beloved Israel needed us most. We met the challenge of global leadership and we met the challenge of standing together with Israel without hesitation the moment the war broke out.

We are indebted to each one of you for your commitment and devotion and we are thankful for your continued support to Jews in need wherever they live.

The following pages are testimony to those who have exceeded all possible expectations, setting an example for future generations of what voluntarism is all about. Regardless of age, gender, socio-economics, or profession, these remarkable men, women and children continue to personify the Jewish values of demonstrating responsibility for each other and of Tikun Olam, repairing the world.

Volunteering – What You Give Comes Back

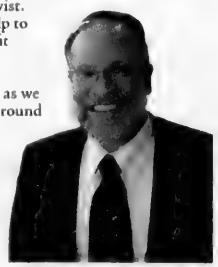
In Modern Hebrew the word for "volunteer" is "mitnadave." In Hebrew grammar the word is reflexive, which means the actions being done refer back onto the individual himself. How does this work? How does the activity undertaken by a volunteer, ostensibly for the benefit of another, refer back onto the volunteer himself?

Our Sages teach that to understand a word in Tanach, it is often helpful to study the first time the word appears. The root of this word is first used in the Torah in Parshat Va'era (Exodus 6.23) where we are told that Aaron names his first born son "Nadav," which means "a gift." It is interesting that this verse identifies Aaron's wife as Elisheva bat Aminadav. The Ramban (Nachmanides) explains that Aminadav was a tzadik, a righteous man, and a leader of the tribe of Judah. Perhaps part of what made Aminadav so special was that his righteousness was presented to his people (ami = my people) as a gift (nadav). While I did not see that any of the standard commentators say this, it is not difficult to assume that Aaron named his eldest child Nadav to reflect the royal gift that his son represented to him.

At the beginning of Parshat Trumah the commentators introduce us to the phrase "n'dirut lebo" which means "the offering of his heart." This is, in fact, the most common usage of the word. The second verse in Chapter 25 of Sefer Shmot (Exodus 25.2) speaks of a person whose heart motivates him to present an offering to G-d. There is clearly a spiritual element in the offering of this gift. One whose spirit moves him will be motivated to give. Such selflessness is characteristic of the Jewish people who see Chessed (acts of loving kindness) as a primary focus of daily life. We are involved in Chessed - not for any thought of personal gain - but simply because it is the right thing to do. We recognize the inherent value in helping others and we are elevated spiritually by acting righteously.

A volunteer is one who truly offers of himself for the benefit of another - but this "offering of the heart" has a pronounced spiritual twist. Some have called this the "boomerang effect" - we provide help to others, but are often amazed at how much we ourselves benefit psychologically, emotionally and, of course, spiritually.

To volunteer is to be involved in holy work. In this New Year, as we focus on how we can improve our lives and the lives of those around us, there is nothing better than giving of oneself through volunteering. This activity strengthens our community, assists those in need and, in truth, makes us better people.



Rabbi Ronald Weiss is Director of Chaplaincy Services at Jewish Family & Child Service.

Day School students volunteer their time and talents for Israel

Students of all ages and their teachers from a wide variety of Jewish schools throughout the Greater Toronto Area are doing what they can to show their support for Israel in light of this summer's war with Hezbollah.

The UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education held a workshop in order to assist the schools, during which participants discussed how to bring Israel into the schools in a meaningful way. The workshop also offered school principals the resources to do so.

At Tanenbaum CHAT Richmond Hill, the school year began with an assembly covering not only the events of the summer, but background and history as well, to ensure that the students were properly informed. The students there are currently volunteering their time to work with a high school in the northern community of Kiryat Shmona that was bombed, so far raising more than $1,000.

At Netivot HaTorah Day School, each grade is being twinned with a family in northern Israel. "Everyone feels a concern," says Vice Principal of Jewish Studies Rabbi Elliott Diamond. "We have a lot of connections, and, in a time of war, our concerns were that much more intense."

At the Kamin Campus of Associated Hebrew Schools, the situation in Israel is being covered in both the formal and informal curriculum. In the first two weeks of school, the students learned songs of peace and hope and volunteered their spare time to prepare banners and plan a rally in which all 1,700 students participated. "We all marched and rallied for Israel with flags, and all the children sang songs," says Kathy Friedman, Principal of the Kamin campus. "It was a powerful voice."

At Bialik Hebrew Day School, the student council continues to raise money that will go to help rebuild day care centres in northern Israel. Students from Junior Kindergarten to grade 8 have all chipped in to help raise the funds.

Meanwhile, students at Leo Baeck Day School have raised more than $2,000 for its counterpart school in Haifa. Students continue to volunteer for Israel through a number of fundraising initiatives, including the design and sale of greeting cards and a bake sale in the school's parking lot. Students also took the time to send Rosh Hashanah cards to students in Haifa to show their support and solidarity.

1,700 students from all grades at the Kamin Campus of Associated Hebrew Schools participated in a recent rally where they marched in support of Israel.

Israelis open their hearts – and homes – to help northern neighbours

As the barrage of rocket attacks began falling on northern Israel this past summer, life immediately came to a standstill for more than one million Israeli residents, many of whom were forced to spend far too much time in bomb shelters to escape the carnage.

To give these beleaguered families a temporary respite from the ongoing danger and stress, volunteers from the southern region of Eilat/Eilot opened their doors – and their hearts to make their lives better.

Eilat welcomes northern neighbours.

Once the war began, more than 50,000 people from shell-shocked northern Israeli towns and cities temporarily moved to Eilat, UJA Federation's twinned community along with the surrounding Eilot area, some to hotels at reduced rates or for free, some with Eilat families, and some at an absorption centre that was opened specially for guests from the north.

With the new visitors, the population of the Eilot region jumped by 50 percent to 4,500 people, as it played host to some 1,500 residents from the north at homes, youth clubs, and several kibbutzim.

"Immediately upon the falling of the first rockets, Eilat Mayor Meir Yitzhak Halevy established a headquarters to organize local host families who welcomed with open arms these strangers into their homes," said Hagit Shilo, The Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) regional manager. "These incredible families were so excited to volunteer themselves and their homes for their northern neighbours. They were just so thrilled to help. Without the many, many volunteers who not only welcomed strangers in their homes, but helped our new visitors on a day-to-day basis, this would probably not have gone as smoothly as it did."

Many of the children temporarily living in the Eilat/Eilot region spent their mornings and early afternoons in special summer camps. Later in the day they participated in organized trips to various attractions, including Eilat's famous underwater observatory, beaches, theatres, and sporting activities – all made possible by the generosity of countless volunteers. Social workers and volunteers also worked with the children from the north, helping them – often through art therapy – to deal with their fears.

Toronto teachers grateful for volunteer opportunity in Israel

This August, UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) led a delegation of Toronto Jewish school teachers on a mission to Eilat, which, along with Eilot, is UJA Federation's partnership region. There they volunteered at a summer camp with children from northern Israel who, thanks to Israel Emergency Campaign funds, had been relocated from the north, which was under constant terrorist rocket attack. In this article, Associated Hebrew Schools Principal Eric Golombek describes the camp experience of the Toronto delegation.

At most camps, when the number of kids goes down, people start to worry. But for all of us, a reduction in numbers was only good news. This is because the camp we helped run this summer was for children from Israel's north, children who fled the barrage of katyusha rockets which destroyed many of their homes and shattered their lives.

The community centre camp is one of a number of projects that we have been involved with. Our group, under the leadership of USDS teacher Adi Sugerman Maidany, went to Eilat to work with the children of the north, providing them with programming to distract them from the trauma they were going through. At the camp, we ran a range of activities, providing much needed relief to the overworked staff who remained at camp, despite August being their vacation month.

In addition to our daily work at the camp, we led a variety of programs for displaced families who were staying at the Goldwater High School. To see families living in such poor conditions was difficult, indeed shocking, for all of us. Typically, four families were crowded into one classroom. Mattresses were spread on the floor for the adults, and children generally would lie on the floor itself. The mood at the high school was depressing.

This situation left many children under-supervised and with little to do. For these children, we set up arts and crafts tables and we ran evening programs. Ora Goldin, a percussion instructor and teacher at Beth Torah, ran rhythm workshops and CHAT teacher, Zeev Steinfeld, led groups in song with his guitar. "Never did I work so hard," said Steinfeld, "but, it was totally worth it. These kids so desperately needed us. I am so grateful that I had a chance to really make a difference." This sentiment was shared by all the participants of our group. Each evening, the group debriefed and planned the next day's activities, a process which often lasted into the early hours.

"You watch the news on TV in Toronto and you feel helpless," said Associated kindergarten teacher, Lisa Hemi. "That's why being in Israel was so important to me. It gave me a chance to do something, however small, to help."

Teachers from UJA Federation's BJE spend time with youngsters from northern Israel during their volunteer mission. The youngsters and their families were invited guests in Eilat, allowing them to escape the war in the north.

Volunteer Excellence: The Community Honours Its Own

The men and women pictured on pages B4 and B5 have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values helps enrich the lives of so many. They will receive their awards at a UJA Federation Awards Night on April 25, 2007.

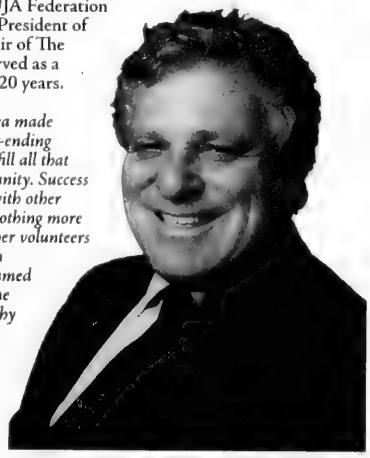
DAVID GOLDSTEIN NAMED SADOWSKI AWARD WINNER

The Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, established in 1961, is this community's most prestigious volunteer recognition award.

David Goldstein personifies voluntarism. A tireless, dedicated and passionate community volunteer, he has an impressive and varied resume.

As a supporter of a number of important community initiatives, David has assumed a leadership role in planning for the future. He currently sits on UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign Leadership Cabinet and on UJA Federation's Board of Directors. In addition, he serves on the Boards of Toronto General Hospital, Western Hospital Foundation, and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee.

David is a Past Chair of UJA Federation's Integrated Development Committee and the UJA Federation annual campaign. He is also a Past President of UIA Federations Canada, Past Chair of The Baycrest Centre Foundation and served as a Director of the Baycrest Centre for 20 years.



"Community is an all-encompassing sea made up of people, facilities, ideas and never-ending needs. No one person or group can fulfill all that is required to build a successful community. Success is reached only when one joins forces with other members of the community. There is nothing more gratifying than being involved with other volunteers and creative, savvy professional staff in achieving tasks and goals that are dreamed about – and making those dreams come true. This is satisfaction and that is why I love to volunteer."

Sherry Firestone Receives Granovsky Award

The Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence honours individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning.

A relative newcomer to the annual UJA Federation campaign, Sherry Firestone has displayed an uncommon drive and commitment to community voluntarism. Her spirit and determination have made her one of UJA Federation's most effective fundraisers. Since becoming involved as a Major Gifts Vice-chair in 2005, she has gone on to co-chair Major Gifts for both the 2006 and 2007 campaigns. Sherry is a regular at UJA Federation telethons and served as a member of the Telethon Task Force in preparation for the current Israel Emergency Campaign 2007.

"I am incredibly moved and honoured to receive this award. Although I never had the good fortune of meeting Phil Granovsky, his legacy and philanthropic contributions to UJA Federation and the Jewish community were monumental and truly inspirational.

It is the responsibility of all Jews to take care of one another. The Toronto community rallied together in the most incredible way this year to launch the Israel Emergency campaign. The incredible spirit of the community - volunteers, donors and UJA staff - was truly remarkable. This amazing response has not only benefited the recipients of this philanthropy, but has inspired our children to continue the legacy of leadership and giving."

Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto PROFESSIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE AWARD OF EXCELLENCE

This Award of Excellence recognizes professionals in the Jewish community whose outstanding long-term contributions benefit the Foundation, lawyers, accountants, estate planners and charitable organizations.

Samuel Gotfrid, Q.C.

There is an old Yiddish proverb that states: "As you get older, you realize that you can't be everything, so you should be more of something." Samuel Gotfrid is quite something, indeed.

As he approaches his one-hundredth year, Samuel – who graduated from Osgoode Hall Law School in 1931 – continues to be involved with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, with which he has been affiliated since his first year in university, demonstrating his vision and commitment from an early age. He served on UJA Federation's Executive and Budget Committees, and still canvasses for its annual campaign. Using his reputation and vast influence, Samuel became involved with UJA Federation's Endowment Fund – now the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – from its inception, and helped it create several multi-million dollar endowments which have been distributed for Jews in need here and in Israel.

"I've been involved in Jewish philanthropy for over 70 years. Most of my time was spent at meetings or delivering talks. I was first motivated by the simple phrase Mr. Sokol addressed to his students at his cheder. He told us that a Jew was obliged to help other Jews whenever required. I have never forgotten that. Additionally, I did other things that I felt would be beneficial for the Jewish community, such as joining with Wilfred Posluns in establishing a new organization that eventually led to the Jewish Foundation. I am also responsible for writing Saul Wagman's will to achieve his wish to create a fund for the education of Jewish children."

HAROLD LEDERMAN AWARD

This Award is presented to an outstanding philanthropic leader and volunteer extraordinaire in our community.

Miles Nadal

Miles Nadal has set a new standard when it comes to community voluntarism, leadership and philanthropy. He is a man to be emulated in order to ensure the future vibrancy and success of Toronto's Jewish community.

As a leader, Miles recruited, encouraged and most importantly – motivated others to get involved with UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) campaign. He not only set an example as a mentor but also as a lead contributor to JTT's downtown campus. His skills, vision and generosity have improved the quality of life for Jews – and non-Jews – throughout the downtown core through the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

In addition, Miles plays key roles with a number of community organizations, including Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Hospital, Reena Foundation, and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

"The philosophy I've always had is that it's a privilege to give. Philanthropy and business are very similar. You need to identify opportunities and then use energy, vision and drive to accomplish things. I've been told, at 48, I'm one of the younger philanthropists in the Jewish community. That's not by accident. Most people wait until they're older or even gone to give back to the community. I get the benefit of seeing the fruits of my labour from year to year, share it with my children and educate them about it."

Leadership Development Awards

The Leadership Development Awards, established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles, are presented to those individuals who demonstrate extraordinary commitment and service.

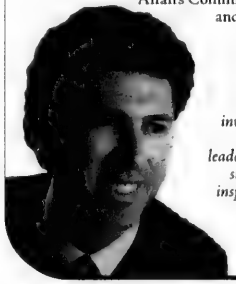
MELISSA MUSKAT

Melissa has been an active volunteer for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for many years. From her start as a canvasser in 1990, she has assumed such leadership roles as Vice-chair of the Young Professionals' Network, Young Lawyers Division and Lawyers Division. During Campaign 2006, she was Co-chair of Canvasser Training and, in the current Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, she is Co-chair of Volunteer Relations.

"As a first generation Canadian, I learned, at a very young age, to be incredibly appreciative of the opportunities that my family was able to provide for me here. As I grew up, my Jewish day school education, Jewish camp experiences and Jewish upbringing at home, instilled in me a deep and passionate commitment to Israel and to the Jewish principle of Tikun Olam. UJA Federation has provided, and continues to provide, me with incredibly fulfilling volunteer and leadership opportunities as I share in its mission to preserve and strengthen the quality of Jewish life at home, in Israel and around the world."

MARK WALDMAN

Having begun his volunteer involvement in his 20s, Mark has gone on to many prominent leadership roles within UJA Federation. Currently on the Board of Directors, he chaired the New Gifts Initiative in 2006 and the Major Gifts Division in 2004 and 2005. He founded and chaired the Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund and has led UJA missions to Israel and Washington, D.C. In addition, he is a founder and Chair of the fundraising committee of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee and sits on the Boards of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center. Mark is also a member of the United Jewish Communities National Young Leadership Cabinet.



"UJA opened the doors of Jewish philanthropy to me and gave me a new-found love for Israel. I joined ATID (UJA Federation's division for the children of leading donors), in my late 20s and was approached to get involved in campaign. I chaired a mission to Israel and, by age 35, I chaired Major Gifts. These experiences inspired me to many different non-profit leadership positions, including joining the UJA Federation Board. I developed strong relationships, experienced great missions and gained access to many inspiring Jewish leaders. My volunteer experience became my passion and so I have devoted my time for the past four years exclusively to philanthropic work for Israel and the Jewish community."

Shem Tov Honourees

The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

EVELINE BERGER
Kehilla Residential Programme
Eveline is currently President of the Kehilla Residential Programme. An Executive Member of the Board since 1991, she previously served two terms each as Treasurer and Secretary. She is a Past President of the Avenal and Mutually Assisting Residential Community (MARC) Board and currently sits on the Board of National Council of Jewish Women Canada (Toronto Section) and on the Steering Committee of Kids on the Block.

"Giving back to the community is very important to me. Volunteering and knowing that I am able to help others gives me a deep sense of fulfillment. I am most grateful for this opportunity."

GLORIA CLAMEN
Circle of Care
Gloria's involvement in the Jewish community is long and varied. A member of the Circle of Care Board of Directors since 1989, she has served as a member of the Service Review Committee, Secretary of the Board and President of the Board from 1997-2001. She is also a past member of the Circle of Care Foundation Board of Directors. She has served as Co-chair of the UJA Federation Walk with Israel and is a Past President of Jewish Women International of Toronto.

"I volunteer because I can. It's my expression of commitment to Tikun Olam and I consider it a lifetime activity. Volunteering is 'the gold standard' by which we measure our commitment to one another."

JACQUELINE FRIEDLAND
Miles Nadal JCC
As a volunteer at the Miles Nadal JCC, Jacqueline has either chaired or served on numerous committees before becoming President of the Board. During the construction of the centre three years ago, she weathered constant challenges - reshaping and encouraging the Board and working to enhance the JCC's relationship with UJA Federation. From the reopening in November 2004 to August 2006, under her leadership, membership increased from 790 to a near maximum capacity of 3,400.

"I volunteer because my mom does! Some of my earliest childhood memories are of stuffing envelopes, sorting clothes at a thrift shop, adopting a new immigrant family. My mother's activities became family activities. It was just natural that I would continue as an adult. I've always believed that I gain more from volunteer experience than those I help."

HOWARD GLOWINSKY
Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa - G'Milath Chaosdim Association
Howard first volunteered at Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa in 1994 as an interviewer on the personal and educational loan committees. Since then, he has served in various capacities as an Executive Board member, including President. He is currently Chairman of the Executive Committee. During his involvement, he has worked to broaden partnerships with other free loan organizations around the world.

"Volunteering at Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa allows me to help those less fortunate than myself. Through detailed examination of the needs of others, I am able to see with clarity the blessings G-d has granted me in my life."

HOWARD PRICE
UJA Federation of Greater Toronto
Howard's volunteer involvement in UJA is extensive. Currently, he is Co-chair of the UJA Federation Partners' Circle. He is a past Vice-chair of the UJA Federation annual campaign and a past Co-chair of both the Physicians Division and Professions Cabinet. Howard is the founding Co-chair of UJA Federation's Maimonides Society and has led the last six UJA Federation Medical Missions to Israel.

"I have enjoyed volunteering for a number of reasons. Firstly, UJA Federation dollars are so necessary here in Canada as well as Israel. Secondly, by volunteering, I have had the pleasure to work with many dedicated professionals and other volunteers. Lastly, UJA Federation provides a tremendous vehicle to get many people involved in the Jewish community."

DAVID ROSENBAUM
Hillel of Greater Toronto
President of Hillel of Greater Toronto until 2008, David has been involved for close to ten years. During that time, he has played an instrumental role in Israel affairs, fundraising, and developing the leadership of the Board and students. Committed to increasing Israel awareness on campus through advocacy, education and dialogue, he has made it possible for speakers such as Alan Dershowitz, Dennis Ross and Elie Wiesel to appear on campus.

"Our Jewish university and college students are our future. Thankfully, our community recognizes that and has been a strong and loyal supporter of Hillel's activities. It gives me great satisfaction to contribute to our Jewish future through my work with Hillel."

ROSALIE SHARP
Ashkenaz Foundation
A past Chair of the Board of Ashkenaz Foundation, Rosalie remains an avid supporter and fundraiser. She is currently Chancellor of the Ontario College of Art and Design and a past Chair of the Board of Trustees there. Rosalie also sits on the Board of the Gardiner Museum. Her latest book, Rifke, Just a Few Steps from the Shtetl, will be published in the spring of 2007.

"The Talmud suggests that everyone give 10% of their worth to charity. Personally, I think this is a low number. Tzedakah is both a duty and a privilege with the emphasis on privilege."

Voluntarism at its best

This past summer, Israel faced one of its most critical moments since the founding of the State. For 34 days, northern Israelis lived directly in the firing line of daily Hezbollah rocket barrages. They were forced from their homes and into bomb shelters to escape the carnage. Their peace of mind was shattered as were their homes and businesses.

Once again, our committed Jewish community stood TOGETHER WITH ISRAEL. By donating financially or volunteering their time and talent, each in their own way, they helped make a positive difference in the lives of our Israeli brothers and sisters.

As chairs of UJA Federation's Leadership Development initiatives, we are buoyed by the selflessness and dedication demonstrated by our community's volunteers, and we look forward to working with the leaders listed in the following pages who are committed to ensuring a bright and prosperous Jewish world for generations to come.

Finally, we thank all our community agencies, schools, congregations and organizations for participating in this, our 12th annual Volunteer Recognition Supplement. Their work is a testament to the strength and integrity of our community and is a tremendous source of pride for us all.

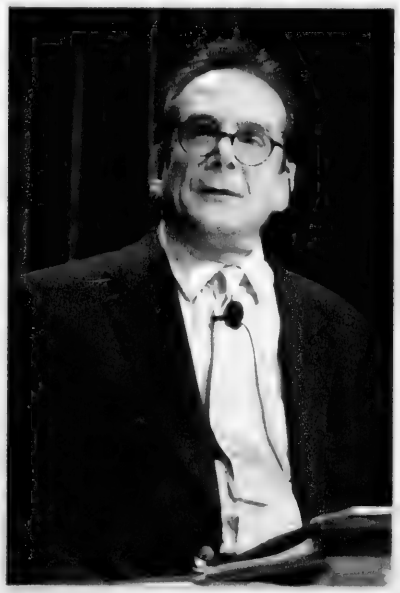
HAPPY BIRTHDAY, ISRAEL!

What a party! More than 3,000 people showed their unwavering support for Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut – Israel's Independence Day – to mark the Jewish State's 58th birthday. The celebration offered fun for the whole family, with singing, dancing, activities for children, a kosher BBQ and live entertainment. The community event was co-sponsored by the Bathurst JCC, Miles Nadal JCC, Schwartz/Reisman Centre, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge & Heritage of UJA Federation and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

EMERGENCY COMMUNITY CAMPAIGN TO SUPPORT ISRAEL



In response to Israel's war with Hezbollah, UJA Federation immediately launched an Israel Emergency Campaign to meet the human needs of Israelis caught in the northern war zone. An overflow crowd of more than 2,500 people attended the launch of Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 to show their support for Israel and to hear political commentator Charles Krauthammer. They also heard an impassioned address by Yair Goldwasser, brother of Ehud Goldwasser, one of the Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah.

STAND WITH ISRAEL

It was a giant rally beyond all expectations! More than 8,000 Jewish and non-Jewish community members filled the Toronto Centre for the Arts, with an overflow at Mel Lastman Square, in support of Israel during its time of crisis. They heard from retired Major-General Lewis MacKenzie, an internationally respected military analyst and one of Canada's most decorated peacekeepers. The rally also featured a live satellite broadcast from northern Israel, where its citizens were being subjected to aggressive attacks by Hezbollah. A highlight of the broadcast was an emotional reunion between Israeli commander Guy Markizano and his brother, Motti, who sat in the Toronto audience fighting back tears. The two brothers sent each other words of comfort and love.

COMMUNITY TELETHON RAISES FUNDS FOR ISRAEL

Nearly 1,000 Jewish community volunteers participated in a massive iniative on behalf of UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007. What has become known as UJA Federation's Super Sunday, followed by Super Week, raised more than $2.6 million for urgent social needs in northern Israel, devastated by Hezbollah rocket attacks. Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 now stands at more than $61 million, with over $18 million specifically designated for Israel's emergency requirements.

MISSION ACCOMPLISHED

Several UJA Federation solidarity missions to northern Israel took dozens of volunteers to a number of northern communities devastated by the war with Hezbollah, including Haifa, Nahariya, Metulla, Kiryat Shmona and Kibbutz Misgav Am, a northern community that overlooks Lebanon. While participants found lingering anguish from the incessant rocket attacks, they saw enormous resilience, as well, among the Israeli citizens.

"My love of Israel drew me to my first trip as a Sar-El volunteer. Since then I have been many times. When I returned after that first trip in 1987, I became a Toronto office volunteer and eventually served as President for seven years."

Chabad Torah Tots Pre-School

Offers a warm, friendly and creative Jewish environment where a child's unique style is valued and nurtured by caring teachers. Provides the excitement of new discoveries and development of responsible and independent thought. Children learn basic attitudes, skills and an ability to study that will always stay with them.

HEATHER AARON
"Volunteering for Torah Tots' Parents' Advisory Council gave me a strong connection to community, invigorated my soul, and allowed me to meet people who enriched my life tremendously. Above all, I hope it inspired my children with a sense of chessed and tikun olam."

Chabad Lubavitch Friendship Circle

A youth-oriented volunteer program that matches children with special needs with teenage/young adult mentors. friendshipcircle@chabad.ca

NECHAMA SHUBOV
"I enjoy volunteering for children with special needs as it gives me a sense of accomplishment. I have gained special qualities from the experience, such as responsibility and sensitivity. I am thankful to be able to contribute to this organization."

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham

Non-judgmental and friendly philosophy, with the belief that, regardless of education background or affiliation, it is the inalienable right of every Jewish person to learn and participate in our heritage which belongs to us all equally.
www.chabadmarkham.org

MONIQUE ISAACSON
"Voluntarism is part of my upbringing. Generally, it is more fulfilling to do than to receive. My children must know that it is important to help others and what better way than to lead by example. Ultimately, the best way to be a part of a community is to be involved in that community."

Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario

Strives ceaselessly to preserve and perpetuate traditional Jewish values. With its numerous affiliate satellite centres throughout the GTA and beyond, Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario is an affiliate of a worldwide organization dedicated to the welfare of the Jewish community.
www.chabad.ca

STEVEN MAIZELS
"For some people, volunteering is a reflexive action. You don't think about it; you just do what needs to be done."

Circle of Care*

Supports individual independence and sustains and enhances quality of life in the community.
www.circleofcare.com

LEAH SEGALOWITZ
"For fourteen years Circle of Care has given me a new purpose in life. As a retired nurse I always felt left out and not needed. The palliative care home visiting gave me a new lease on life."

Congregation Darchei Noam – Social Action Committee

We, as Jews, are committed to addressing the pain and suffering of people who are homeless by offering food, shelter and friendship as a Jewish solution to a community problem. www.darcheinoam.on.ca

LYNDA CHAMPAGNE
"I began as part of a group working to ease the struggle of homelessness, even if just for one night each week. Now Thursdays have become a time to host friends, those very same people I once thought of as 'the homeless'."

Downtown Jewish Community School*

Provides Jewish students with a basis for Jewish identity in a pluralistic community. Students are taught the concepts and skills necessary to live a Jewish life and to feel comfortable within a Jewish setting. www.djcs.org

PAUL BAIN
"DJCS has provided an excellent Jewish education to thousands of Jewish children in downtown Toronto over the past quarter century. Schools like the DJCS are the key to Jewish continuity in Toronto."

Canada's first and only Jewish school for children with learning disabilities and attention deficit disorders. Programs are designed to help students reach their personal and academic potential by providing them with strategies to manage their difficulties. faigied@shearim.ca

RUTHIE MAMMON
"For the past four years I have enjoyed giving my time as the Treasurer of the Parents' League. It has allowed me to take an active role in this special school for children with learning disabilities and to get to know most of the parents. As well, I have enjoyed working with the She'arim staff, a community of devoted people who want to see both the school and its students grow and succeed. I am proud to be a part of the She'arim family and look forward to continuing my volunteer work at the school."

Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth - (ECRUSY)

Serving grades 6-12, the youth arm of the Conservative Movement, affiliated with The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. Offers middle and high school students opportunities to immerse themselves in various Jewish and social activities while forming friendships that will last a lifetime. www.ecrusy.org

Habayit Shelanu Seniors Residences Corporation

A unique living environment based on recognition of the changing needs of older adults. Committed to providing an environment that fosters a positive Jewish identity. afoss@circleofcare.com

WENDY PAPERNICK
"I joined the Board of Directors because I am impressed with the organization's important work ensuring that seniors have optimum care and support. I want to use my skills as a chartered accountant at PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP to assist the Board in providing a secure future for Habayit Shelanu."

Hillel of Greater Toronto*

The address for Jewish student life in Toronto. Through exciting and creative programming and events, Hillel promotes Jewish identity, student leadership, and religious and political diversity in a dynamic and inclusive environment for all Jewish students. www.hilleltoronto.org

MICHAEL FERMAN
Hillel – City Wide Student Council
"I volunteer with Hillel because I strongly believe in its mandate to engage Jewish students in Jewish life. My involvement is deeply rewarding and has intensified my active engagement in Jewish communal life."

JONATHAN VANDERSLUIS
Hillel @ Ryerson
"My role in Hillel allows me the privilege of instilling Judaism into the lives of university students in the hope that they will maintain strong ties to Judaism now and in the future."

KIM GUIGUI
Hillel @ U of T Mississauga
"It is crucial to have other Jewish students, staff, and faculty to rely on, and to know that they can also count on us in return. Without this solidarity, we and other students would feel unrepresented and unheard on campus."

HAGAI KUPERMAN
Hillel @ U of T St. George
"I remember the first time I set foot on a university campus and all I really wanted to do was connect with Jewish students and be involved with a campus club. Getting involved with Hillel at the University of Toronto allowed me to pursue the kind of Jewish activities that were really important to me and, even more, it helped develop my inner leadership qualities that have made me a stronger individual in all areas of my life."

ADAM HUMMEL
Hillel @ York University
"I believe that Jewish campus life is the most important way to support Israel and the Jewish community. Jewish students today have incredible opportunities, and it is important for every single one to feel comfortable and proud at university. Volunteering for Hillel, an organization that provides students with the chance to take advantage of these options, allows me to generate meaningful experiences for others, and give Jewish students a more active and vocal role in the overall community."

Hebrew Club for the Blind

Provides social programs in a pleasant environment for its visually impaired members of all ages. The togetherness and camaraderie that comes from the unique membership of the club often leads to lasting friendships. Shoshana at 905-660-4780

On behalf of the Hebrew Club for the Blind, we would like to thank our volunteers for the dedication, patience and enthusiasm you have shown over the years. It would be impossible without you to run a successful club and allow those to participate who otherwise would not have been able to. Your hard work will always be appreciated and admired. Each and every one of you is a blessing for us. Thank you with all our hearts!

Israeli Forum*

A newly established not-for-profit organization representing and catering to the needs of the Israeli Canadian community.
gsarner@ujafed.org

GIL BLUTRICH
"The Israeli community can be proud of establishing the Israeli Forum that will not only address the needs of the Israelis in Toronto but will strengthen the connections between the Jewish community and the growing Israeli community. As a local source of power, we will help Israel the way we supported the northern cities and their residents during the Lebanon war. We were proud to help and the Israeli authorities were grateful for that."

DAVID ZALTZMAN
"I have been volunteering most of my life, but here in Toronto, volunteering for the Israeli community has some added value: a new world of 'doing' has been open to me. The more I volunteer in the Israeli Forum and the Israeli school Kachol-Lavan, the more I know about the needs of the Israeli community and about the many important things that should be done jointly by the Jewish and Israeli communities."

JACS (Jewish Alcoholics Chemically Dependent Persons & Significant Others)*

An organization led by volunteers dedicated to encouraging and assisting alcoholics, chemically dependent persons and their families, friends and associates to explore recovery in a nurturing Jewish environment. JACS exists to provide support for Jews in recovery and to be an information resource on the effects of alcoholism and drug dependency on Jewish family life. www.jacstoronto.org

JILL GOTLIEB
"I got involved as a result of seeing how this organization has helped people. JACS gives people a place to turn to and find assistance while dealing with the chaos of substance abuse."

ART SILBER
"I feel privileged to be a part of the program at JACS that shines the light on a very dark area by bringing awareness and safety to teenagers and their families in addiction crises."

www.jewsforjudaism.org

CHARLES GLINA
"Having first-hand experience with Christian missionaries, I know the work of Jews for Judaism is unparalleled. By confronting missionaries on street corners, educating and counseling Jews and distributing literature, Jews for Judaism is saving Jewish souls."

JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto*

Facilitates the lawful entry and resettlement of Jewish refugees and immigrants arriving in Toronto. Advances their well-being by providing transition and orientation services for integration into the Jewish community and Canadian society-at-large. www.jiastoronto.org

JIAS Toronto extends its thanks to the group of nine dedicated volunteers of the Give The Kids Foundation, who make the birthdays of over 150 newcomer children a year all the more special by giving each one a knapsack filled with gifts when they celebrate their first birthday in their new home. In many cases, this is the first gift a new immigrant child receives in Toronto, and it comes with a message to the whole family that Toronto is a caring, welcoming city. These women display a rare type of generosity and thoughtfulness, which is all about tzedakah at its best.

JVS Toronto*

Working in strong partnership with government and business for over 60 years to assist people to achieve their educational and employment potential. www.jvstoronto.org

CAROLIN MICHAELS
"I volunteer at JVS Toronto because it is a wonderful dynamic organization where volunteers are sincerely respected and greatly appreciated."

"The Jewish people, ever since David slew Goliath, have never considered youth as a barrier to leadership."

- President John F. Kennedy

Limmud Canada

Dedicated to enhancing informal Jewish education to the entire community in all its diversity and to all ages of participants from children to adults. Limmud Canada's activities aim to provide opportunities for Jewish education, development and inspiration for each of its participants. www.limmud.ca

RUTH MARGLES
"The Festival of Jewish Learning was both challenging and rewarding, encompassing programming on Israel, history, arts and culture, text study and contemporary issues. I was proud to be a part of Limmud's approach to offer an opportunity for people from all sectors of the Jewish community to openly gather and learn from each other solely for the joy of learning."

"...the greatest reward for doing is the opportunity to do more."

- Jonas Salk

Maccabi Canada

Promotes Jewish identity and traditions through athletic, cultural, social and educational activities for both youth and adults and promotes a bond with the State of Israel, both domestically and abroad. www.maccabicanada.com

We have the talented athletes. We have the dedicated coaches. We have a strong administrative team. But what we also have at Maccabi Canada is something very special – the volunteers who give of their precious time – over and over again – to help Jewish athletes get the support needed to compete at the Maccabiah Games held every four years in Israel. And so, there are many wonderful things that might never get done if it wasn't for the kind of volunteers like ours across the country. Success in life is not what you do for yourself; it's what you do for others. To all our volunteers - thank you. Chazak v'Amatz.

MAZON Canada

The national Jewish response to hunger, MAZON Canada raises funds primarily from within the Jewish community and distributes those funds, on a non-denominational basis, to Canadian organizations battling hunger on the front lines. MARK SATOK

"My parents taught me at an early age the importance of volunteering and standing up for your community. One of the reasons I continue to volunteer year after year is to continue that tradition and teach my children the importance of helping others. UJA has always impressed me with how they deal with Jews in need here in Toronto, Israel and around the world, and I hope with my volunteer work with UJA, I can help make a difference."

Women's Campaign & Advocacy

ANITA ROBINS

"I have always felt it was my duty to become involved in my community while I have the privilege of staying at home with my kids. When Laurie [Sheff] asked me to get involved in UJA Federation with her, it seemed like a good opportunity to gain insight into UJA and become more involved in the Toronto Jewish community."

LAURIE SHEFF

"I am delighted to be recognized, along with my friend Anita Robins. I have always had the utmost respect for UJA Federation and the work being done there. My family has had a long relationship with Federation and I feel lucky to be able to give some of my time to an organization dedicated to helping our wonderful Jewish community both at home and in Israel. I feel that it is important as a mother and role model to my children that I teach them at a young age how fortunate we are to live in Canada and how meaningful it can be to give back to our community."

RANDY SHIFF

"BJE is about much more than subsidizing the educational costs of students. It initiates, implements and monitors scores of programs that enhance the quality of Jewish education in Toronto – formal, informal, supplementary and day schools – which together enrich the quality of Jewish life in Toronto. Much more remains to be done. It is exciting to be part of this enterprise."

Toronto Jewish Youth Council

Comprised of youth movement professionals and shlichim, TJYC is dedicated to strengthening Jewish youth movements in Toronto and enhancing the movement environment as a whole. It strives to develop cooperative projects that enhance the Jewish experiences for our city's youth. Argentine prosecutors urge arrest of Iranian officials

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Argentine prosecutors last week called for judicial arrest warrants of senior Iranian officials, including a former president and a top Hezbollah leader, for the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community building that killed 85 people and wounded 300.

Iran responded by dismissing the prosecutors' report on "that stinking file" and suggested it was aimed at "pleasing the Zionists and the Americans while diverting the [sic] world public opinion."

In a news conference in Buenos Aires, prosecutors Alberto Nisman and Marcelo Martinez Burgos called for the arrest of former Iranian president Ayatollah Hashemi Rafsanjani and seven other senior officials, including Ali Akbar Velayati, the former foreign minister, currently the chief foreign policy advisor to Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei; Maj.-Gen. Ahmad Vahidi, currently deputy defence minister; and Imad Fayez Mugniyeh, commander of Hezbollah's overseas operations.

Blame laid for 1994 AMIA bombing that killed 85 people

"We have proven that the decision to attack the AMIA headquarters on July 18, 1994... was a decision taken by high-ranking authorities in Iran's government at the time," Nisman told news agencies in Buenos Aires. "These authorities ordered the Lebanese Shiite organization Hezbollah to carry out this attack. It is known that this organization is, from all points of view, a sub-organization of the regime in Tehran."

Prosecutors allege the attack was planned on Aug. 14, 1993, in the Iranian city of Mashad in retaliation for the decision by Argentina in 1991 to stop assisting Iran's nuclear technology program.

In Ottawa, Israel's ambassador to Canada Alan Baker said the Argentine prosecutors' report shows just how dangerous Iran and its proxy, Hezbollah, can be.

Baker said the prosecutors' finding that Iran and Hezbollah colluded at the highest levels "confirms to the world at large the danger that exists from both Hezbollah and Iran."

Baker said the prosecutors' investigation reveals "the linkage between them as terrorist entities that will go to any length to kill innocent people. We hope this will open further the eyes of the international community to the dangers of Iran."

Hashemi Rafsanjani

The call for arrest warrants follows previous investigations that had also implicated Iran and Hezbollah, but collapsed when evidence arose of corruption and incompetence A former judge in charge of the case, Juan Jose Galeano, had been disqualified after information came to light that he had bribed a witness.

The judge currently heading up the case, Rodolfo Canicoba Corral, will decide whether to ask for the arrest and extradition of the eight named Iranian suspects.

In a news release posted on the website of the Iranian Embassy in Ottawa, Iran's prosecutor general Hojjatoleslam Qorban-Ali Dorri-Najafabadi was quoted as saying,

The News in Brief

CANADA

Lawyer Honoured

TORONTO — Litigator Martin Teplitzky, founder of the program Lawyers Feed the Hungry, is being honoured Nov. 8 by the Law Foundation of Ontario with its Guthrie Award. Teplitzky's eight-year-old program runs three days a week out of Toronto's Osgoode Hall and feeds 1,500 weekly meals to the homeless. The award recognizes individuals or groups for public service, for increasing access to justice, or for symbolizing excellence in the legal profession.

Arabs Chide Harper

CAIRO — The head of the Arab League says Prime Minister Stephen Harper's strong support of Israel marks a swing away from traditional Canadian policy and jeopardizes Canada's potential as a neutral arbiter in the Mideast peace process. Amr Moussa, 70, told the Globe and Mail last week that he was disappointed with Canada's decision to be among the first countries to cut aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas won parliamentary elections this year, and he criticized Harper's "rushed" backing of Israel's recent invasion of Lebanon. "A policy based on total and full bias to one party to an unacceptable proportion will do nothing but damage that [country's] diplomacy," Moussa said.

Cotler Receives Award

BOSTON — Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler has been awarded Tufts University's Jean Mayer Global Citizenship Award for his work in international law and human rights. The award is named for the 10th president of Tufts, who was a renowned nutritionist. Previous winners include Iranian Nobel Peace laureate Shirin Ebadi and economist John Kenneth Galbraith.

Radler Buys Record

MONTREAL — David Radler is an investor in a company that has bought the Sherbrooke Record, the first paper he and his ex-business partner Conrad Black bought in 1969 on their way to creating media giant Hollinger, which is now the subject of criminal investigations. Radler, 64, is part-owner of the privately held Alberta Newspaper Group, which bought the paper last month from a B.C. firm. Radler has pleaded guilty to mail fraud and is co-operating with U.S. investigators who accuse Black and other Hollinger executives of illegally diverting money from the firm to their own pockets.

MPs Call For Cash

OTTAWA — Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, a group co-chaired by Winnipeg MP Anita Neville and Senator David Smith, wrote to Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness Stockwell Day last week to urge him to help offset security costs for at-risk, targeted communities, including Jews. The MPs want funding for groups "who are disproportionately likely to be targeted by terrorist organizations and who require additional security measures to safely function."

WORLD

Art List Goes Online

VIENNA — A list of Nazi-looted art in Austrian collections is now online. The Claims Conference said the still-incomplete list covers items in museum and public collections, and has 7,500 works, each with restitution status. It was set up by the Austrian National Fund, a state initiative that helps with restitution for Austrian Jewish Shoah victims. The German site is www.kunstrestitution.at. An English version will be up in 2007.

Eruv Faces Opposition

LOS ANGELES — An attempt to build an eruv in southern California is running into environmental opposition. Observant Jews have applied for permission to build the eruv in the sands of Venice Beach, but environmentalists say the boundary would violate a state law that protects beachside views and bird habitats. The eruv, which would allow observant Jews to carry things on Shabbat, is the last part of an eruv begun in 2002. A state commission is expected to decide on the $20,000 proposal – the cost would be borne by a local synagogue – this month.

Duke Speaks at Univ.

KIEV — White supremacist David Duke spoke Oct. 19 in Kiev, Ukraine, at a meeting organized by a university with a history of anti-Semitism. Duke spoke at MAUP about alleged "Zionist influence" over U.S. foreign policy and mass media. He also signed copies of his book, The Jewish Question Through the Eyes of an American, the school's website said. Duke has appeared at several conferences at MAUP in recent years, and the school recently awarded him with a doctorate.

Graves Desecrated

KIEV — Eighteen tombstones were destroyed in a Jewish cemetery in central Ukraine. The incident at Gluhov cemetery occurred overnight on Oct. 18-19. Police are investigating.

Neo-Nazis Arrested

BERLIN — German police arrested 16 neo-Nazis at an Oct. 22 rally in Berlin supporting Michael Regener, the jailed leader of the banned skinhead rock group Landser, or Foot Soldiers. The protest was organized by the far-right National Democratic Party, which recently won seats in a second regional Parliament.

Congressman Raps Carter Over Book Title

WASHINGTON — A leading U.S. black congressman called former U.S. president Jimmy Carter to chide him for titling his new book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.

John Conyers, a Michigan Democrat, said that using apartheid in the title "does not serve the cause of peace and the use of it against the Jewish people in particular, who have been victims of the worst kind of discrimination, discrimination resulting in death, is offensive and wrong."

In an Oct. 25 statement, Conyers – a 20-term representative and a founder of the Congressional Black Caucus – said he called Carter "to express my concerns about the title of the book, and to request that the title be changed. President Carter does not build upon his career as a proponent of peace in the Middle East with this comparison, and I hope he and his publisher will reconsider this decision."

Carter's book is due to be published this month by Simon and Schuster.

Rabbis organize protest outside home of get refuser

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Binson refused to respond to crowd

MONTREAL — Communal pressure on men who refuse to give their ex-wives a get was ramped up to an unprecedented level in Montreal last Friday morning when rabbinical authorities organized a demonstration outside the home of Jacob Binson, who has been civilly divorced from Pearl Binson for about seven years.

About 20 people responded to the e-mailed invitation from Rabbi Michael Whitman, president of the Rabbinical Council of Montreal, the main organization of Orthodox synagogue rabbis that is affiliated with the Rabbinical Council of America, to participate in a "forceful yet peaceful rally" in front of Binson's modest apartment building on Beaucourt Street in Cote des Neiges. The CJN was among media invited to cover the event.

Rabbi Whitman said the action was taken after Binson failed to respond to the imprecations of numerous rabbis over the years and repeated summons by the Beth Din.

"Every kind of persuasion, everything imaginable, by everyone who knows him, has been tried, all to no avail," he said.

The action was supported by the Vaad Ha'ir (the Jewish Community Council of Montreal) and the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get.

Binson, if he was home, did not respond to the protesters.

Rabbis Whitman of Congregation Adath Israel Poale Zedek Anshei Ozeroff, Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem and Asher Jacobson of Congregation Chevra Kadisha-B'nai Jacob, with two reporters and a photographer in tow, went up to his third-floor apartment and knocked on his door repeatedly and called out his name.

The phone number they had for him, which is not listed, was not in service. The number on the apartment door had been altered. A police car arrived on the scene, but soon left.

Rabbi Whitman had with him an extraordinary form that he would have asked Binson to sign, in the presence of two witnesses, which authorizes the completion of the get process, without either him or his ex-wife having to go before the Beth Din and him having to formally present the get to her.

Simultaneously, a demonstration was held outside the home of his mother, Esther (Lamara) Binson in Boro Park, N.Y., because, according to Rabbi Whitman, she is pressuring her son to continue to refuse a get to his wife. "She is enabling his behaviour."

Rabbi Whitman and other local rabbis have spoken to her many times, as recently as a few months ago, and she has reacted angrily to any suggestion that her son release his wife from being an agunah.

The Montreal demonstration, which lasted about half an hour, was held with the approval of Pearl Binson, who lives in Montreal, he said.

The couple, described as religiously observant, were married for at least 12 years and have six or seven children, the oldest of whom are married, he said.

Rabbi Jacobson, who has met with Binson many times, described him as over 50, not remarried, unemployed, quite isolated, and suffering from a deep sense of loss.

There is no evidence that Binson is seeking any money or other compensation for issuing the get. Rabbi Jacobson said it appears he believes there is still hope that he can reconcile with his ex-wife.

"He is a broken man, living in his own world… with expectations beyond the norm. Primarily, he wants his family back… He feels giving the get would be like giving up everything he has left," Rabbi Jacobson said.

Alienation or community?

From the editor's desk

The story appeared on page one of the Jerusalem Post last Wednesday. The next day the paper ran a followup item and Ha'aretz published a story on the subject, although not as prominently placed as that of the Post the day before.

The ostensible subject was the release of a study by the American Jewish Committee (AJC) at a special joint session of the Knesset education and immigrant absorptions committee that found, according to the Post, that only 14 per cent of Israeli schools teach anything about American Jewry.

The study, titled Teaching about American Jewry in Israeli Education, was conducted by the Levinsky College of Education for the AJC. Rabbi Edward Rettig, one of the co-ordinators and initiators of the study, expressed sadness and disappointment with the results and described them as an "educational failure."

Apparently, Education Minister Yuli Tamir had recently expressed the intention to add curriculum content regarding Diaspora Jewry and broader Jewish studies as a way of "moulding Jewish identity."

But no action to date has yet been undertaken to develop the curriculum. According to the Post, the director general of the Education Ministry, Shmuel Abuav said last month that "the agenda here is so crowded that it doesn't leave much ability to deal with issues beyond the boundaries of the state."

But the deeper, far more significant story was the coupling of the results of this AJC study with those of one the committee released only last month in the United States.

Titled Young Jewish Adults in the United States Today, the study concluded, according to the Post, that only about one-third of young Jewish Americans felt caring about Israel as important to their Jewish identities.

The latter study was itself a compilation and summation of the finds of all the studies conducted in the past few years among the 1.5 million American Jews in their 20s and 30s.

All of these component studies found that Israel was not important to the Jewish identity, such as it is, among young Jewish adults. Indeed, one study cited in the newspaper reports, conducted in 2000, found that Israel placed 11th out of 15 Jewish identity markers suggested by the individuals surveyed.

According to Ha'aretz, all the studies found that "the younger the interviewees, the less sympathy they felt for Israel. Indeed, the sense of belonging to the Jewish people also fell the younger the respondent. For example, a study from 2001, found that less than 30 per cent of the young people felt they belonged to 'the Jewish nation' compared to 42 per cent of the 65-year-olds and older."

The implications of the findings of both studies were stark and profoundly disturbing.

Rabbi Rettig sounded the alarm.

"These findings represent a strategic threat for Israel. When 70 per cent of American Jewish young people no longer see caring about Israel as a core component of their identity and 85 per cent of schools in Israel don't expose their children to knowledge about American Jewry, we must realize that we've already slipped quite far down the slope."

"The two communities are developing very different ways of being Jewish that often seem mutually unintelligible. We're reaching a point at which the two centres of the Jewish world won't understand each other," Rettig told the Knesset committee.

The Jews of Israel and the United States comprise more than 80 per cent of the Jewish population of the world, with each community, at this point in time, contributing approximately 40 per cent of the total. Indeed, the Israeli portion has already surpassed the American.

The chairman of the Knesset committee, Labor MK Rabbi Michael Melchior, agreed with Rabbi Rettig's assessment.

"The danger is tremendous," he said. "The core of the problem is Israel's unwillingness to deal with its Jewish identity. Since the establishment of the state, Israel's Jewish identity was a victim of the religious-secular divide. Now, however, we are discovering that when you take the Judaism out of the system, nothing connects Jews here and Jews in the rest of the world."

Melchior's observation, though aimed at the Israeli education system, cut to the very heart of the matter and is as relevant to Jewish education in the Diaspora. It warrants repetition and emphasis: "When you take the Judaism out of the system, nothing connects Jews here and Jews in the rest of the world."

The key to creating and instilling a sense of Jewish peoplehood, interconnectedness and belonging is through Jewish education in its intensive, broad and beautiful sense, irrespective of the particular stream or Jewish affiliation.

The latter AJC study dealt only with American Jewry, but the lessons are many and important for Canadians as well. Every reasonable effort must be made and every possible resource must be mobilized in our communities to secure the affordability, expand the reach and deepen the quality of Jewish education.

Teaching the religion, thought, traditions and history of the Jewish people is the best way to ensure Jewish identity in future generations and the desire to preserve and perpetuate it for all generations to come.

For out of a sense of Jewish identity, inevitably flows that sense of peoplehood and the feeling of responsibility one for the other, which is and has been, after all, at the very heart of communal life and structure wherever Jews live. –MBD

War affects Bonds sales, UJA donations

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jews, galvanized by Israel's war this summer with Hezbollah, have responded by increasing their UJA pledges and buying more State of Israel Bonds.

Canada-wide, there has been an increase in donations of 30 to 50 per cent, said Perry Romberg, director of campaign and regional community services for UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC). "There has been a tremendous response, including in smaller communities."

As of Oct. 18, UIAFC had received more than $23 million in cash donations for Israel, he said. Its goal for the year is $30 million to $40 million.

"There are so many stories," said Ariella Rohringer, this year's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Israel Emergency campaign co-chair with Fred Waks. "We have people who went from zero to $18,000 and zero to $50,000 [donations]."

In addition, she noted, 63 per cent of Toronto donors have increased their pledges. Thirty-five donors are in the "top gift" category ($50,000 or more) for the first time, and 181 are now "major gift" donors ($10,000 or more).

The 2007 campaign, which winds up in December, is "not what we signed up for, obviously," said Rohringer. However, she said, "it's been so heartwarming to see the response of the Toronto community."

The campaign launched a month early with an Aug. 8 event that attracted an overflow crowd for the first time. Preceding that was an Israel rally in late July attended by 8,000 people.

"We were the first in the world to launch an emergency campaign," said Rohringer. "[It] created a real momentum."

As of last week, this year's emergency campaign in Toronto had raised $66.8 million, already exceeding last year's final total of $58.5 million. Of the funds raised this year, $19 million has been allocated for Israel's emergency needs. The emergency campaign goal is $20 million, which has been added to its initial prewar $61-million goal.

By the end of the campaign, UJA Federation expects to send at least $35 million to Israel for both emergency and regular requirements, said spokesperson Howard English.

The federation is still collecting money in its final campaign phase, called Project Northern Recovery. Emergency allocations will be used to help victims of terror and to fund counselling for children and new immigrants, as well as small business loans for the "suddenly unemployed," post-secondary scholarships, the repair and re-equipment of community facilities, and a new initiative encouraging northern residents to remain and young families to move to the area.

A controversy over UJA campaign allocations that arose in the United States early last month does not apply to Canada, English said.

A mass e-mail circulated by Helen Freedman, former executive director of American Friends for a Safe Israel, a group that opposed Israel's disengagement from Gaza last year, insinuated that 30 per cent of the money allocated by United Jewish Communities was going to support Arab causes. UJC rejected the allegations, saying the actual allocation to non-Jewish causes was three per cent.

In Canada, although the federations are affiliated with UJC, money for Israel is funnelled through UIA Federations Canada.

Campaign money raised in Toronto was not sent to non-Jewish communities in Israel, but there has been funding of mixed communities, also accounting for about three per cent of the total allocated for Israel, English said.

"It's both impossible and illegal to separate Jews from non-Jews when providing assistance to mixed communities," he said. "That's not something we would want to be part of."

Sales of Israel Bonds have risen by 15 per cent in Canada for the year to date, compared to the same time period last year. However, in July and August, there was an increase in bond sales of more than 80 per cent compared to the same two-month period last year, said Elan Levitan, marketing director and vice-president of State of Israel Bonds Canada.

Even given other factors such as interest rates and maturity dates of existing bonds, Levitan said "there certainly is a spike in sales, and [taking into account] anecdotal evidence, there's little left to conclude other than that the community's responded to the war situation with tremendous solidarity."

Buying bonds, he explained, supports public infrastructure in Israel. "People realize through the media reports that there were substantial damages to infrastructure [during the summer war]".

As of last week, results of Israel Bonds' annual High Holy Day campaign were still being tabulated, but Levitan said indications were "that the campaign this year was healthy."

Lebovic brothers give Mount Sinai record gift

Toronto hospital receives $50 million

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Joseph and Wolf Lebovic have donated $50 million to Mount Sinai Hospital, the largest donation to a hospital in Canadian history.

The brothers, land developers and Holocaust survivors who are originally from Czechoslovakia, have a longstanding relationship with Mount Sinai, the hospital's president and CEO Joseph Mapa told The CJN following last Friday's announcement of the gift.

Both Lebovics are on the board of directors of the 472-bed teaching hospital, and five of Wolf's six children were born there.

Mapa said he wanted to convey the "excitement of the organization" about the donation. "This is huge."

The gift will help fund the hospital's share of a capital redevelopment program, Mount Sinai said in a statement. An initial $8-million grant from the province of Ontario will also fund the project.

The Lebovic donation will go toward the hospital's "highest priorities," said Mapa, citing patient care, capital redevelopment, facilities, faculty and staff. "This will be a great boost for us."

Upgrading facilities and equipment for the hospital's Women's and Infants' Health Centre of Excellence in the 30-year-old University Avenue building is the first phase of the project.

Wolf, left, and Joseph Lebovic gave $50 million to Mount Sinai, the largest donation ever to a Canadian hospital.

New signs at the hospital's entrances were unveiled in a ceremony last Friday. The "Mount Sinai Hospital: Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Health Complex" includes the entire hospital as well as the three-year-old Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Centre on nearby Murray Street, for which the brothers had already donated $10 million.

Their business, Lebovic Enterprises, was founded by their father, Harry. Starting with single-family homes, it branched out into highrises, as well as commercial and industrial buildings, in Toronto and surrounding areas.

Prior to last week's donation, the largest gift to a Canadian hospital was a $37-million donation by gold magnate Peter Munk to Toronto General Hospital earlier this year. Also this year, philanthropist Lawrence Tanenbaum donated $25 million to Mount Sinai for biomedical research.

The Lebovics, who are said to give away up to 75 per cent of their annual income, provided $20 million for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, now being built in Vaughan.

The former Jewish National Fund Negev dinner honorees also established the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo. They support a range of charities including Scarborough Centenary Hospital, Ner Israel Yeshiva, the Weizmann Institute of Science, Shaare Zedek Medical Center, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Canadian Opera Company, the National Ballet of Canada, and the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

The brothers were not available for comment before The CJN went to press on Monday.

But in a statement released by the hospital, they said that Mount Sinai "is an incredible institution, a place of extraordinary accomplishment, dedication, compassion and commitment. It gives us great pleasure to be able to give something back to our community."

PROJECT NORTHERN RECOVERY

A Time To Rebuild

Northern Israel may be out of the headlines, but it's not out of difficulty or danger. Terrorist rockets caused untold trauma and an estimated billion dollars in damage and lost income.

That's why UJA Federation is initiating the next phase of Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, PROJECT NORTHERN RECOVERY.

If you have yet to make a commitment to the emergency campaign, please consider this:

- Thousands of small businesses in the north still stand on the brink of bankruptcy.
- Thousands of children -- many of them new immigrants -- are struggling with the after-effects of trauma suffered during the war.
- Hundreds of students cannot afford college this semester because of lost income during the summer.
- Damage at many community facilities, such as hospitals, require repair.

Your gift to Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 is urgently required to help restore normalcy to the north and strengthen the region. Here's what your contribution will provide:

- A re-invigorated Fund for Victims of Terror
- Crucial counseling for children and new immigrants
- Small business loans for the suddenly unemployed
- Scholarships for students who can no longer afford post-secondary education
- Funds to repair and re-equip critical community facilities
- Funding for a new initiative encouraging northern residents to remain and young families to move to the area

Today, the emergency is far from over and the needs are far from being fully met. Your contribution will ensure that northern Israel never feels abandoned or alone.

The Europeans just don't get it

The propensity of many of Europe's leaders to lecture Israel's leaders regarding the best options for Israeli security is irritating, if not also grossly vain on their part. But their inability to grasp some of the essential truths of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians is discouraging, and in times such as these, when dangers lurk increasingly from rising coalitions of Islamic radicals, even distressing.

Last week, the European Union's (EU) foreign policy chief, Javier Solana was in Israel as part of a six-day tour to the region – he also visited the Palestinian Territories, Lebanon, Jordan and Egypt – as part of an effort to resuscitate the deeply dormant peace process.

In view of the opinions he offered the Jerusalem Post, it is unclear how he hopes to achieve this.

"I don't think the essence of Hamas is the destruction of Israel. The essence of Hamas is the liberation of the Palestinians. The liberation of their people, not the destruction of their people."

Even the most charitable interpretation of Solana's remarks can yield only scorn for them. Whether the destruction of Israel is the "essence" of Hamas or a mere manifestation of that essence, whether it is the group's strategic objective or merely a tactical objective, whether their "ends" or their "means," how is it in any way relevant to the situation?

Despite the wishful thinking and earnest importunings of the EU, the leader of Hamas in Gaza, Ismail Haniyeh, and his master in Damascus, Khaled Meshal, refuse to acknowledge the right for Jews to have a sovereign existence in the Middle East. Their charter forbids it. Their aspirations are a pernicious paean to racism, genocide and politicide. The following is but a small sampling:

"The Islamic Resistance Movement believes that the land of Palestine is an Islamic waqf [religious trust] consecrated for future Muslim generations until Judgment Day." (Art. 11) "Initiatives, and so-called peaceful solutions and international conferences, are in contradiction to the principles of the Islamic Resistance Movement." (Art. 13) "Leaving the circle of struggle with Zionism is high treason, and cursed be he who does that." (Art. 32). They even specifically acknowledge the anti-Semitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

No matter how Solana understands these words, he must not try to parse or explain away their elemental meaning.

"I cannot imagine that the religious imperative, the real imperative, can make anybody destroy another country," he told the Post.

Where has Solana been? How much incitement to violence and calls to Jihad must he hear, how much terrorism must he actually see before he understands who and what Hamas is?

Canada and a number of other countries consider Hamas to be a terrorist group and treat it as such. So should Solana. But he just does not get it. Unfortunately, it is the Israelis and other peace-seeking peoples in the region who pay the price for his lack of understanding.

Harper's support of Israel

The unqualified support by Prime Minister Stephen Harper for the State of Israel is a welcome change from the lukewarm platitudes that the former Liberal governments voiced when dealing with Israel ("PM stresses his support for Israel," CJN, Oct. 26). Before Jewish audiences, Liberal leaders would profess the right for Israel to survive behind secure borders and then within days Canada's representatives at the United Nations would vote in favour of resolutions that were biased against Israel and more often than not contained unwarranted criticism of instances in which Israel was acting in self-defence. On the odd occasion, Canada would abstain at the United Nations, which is hardly a warm measure of support. For the unambiguous expression of friendship by the prime minister for the State of Israel, it is incumbent when the next federal election is called that every Jew vote Conservative.

No prenuptial agreement made

In the article "Supreme Court to hear agunah damages case" (CJN, Oct. 26), it was reported that a prenuptial agreement had been made to give a get upon civil divorce. That was not the case. In the divorce settlement agreement, an undertaking was made by the man, Jessel (Jason) Markovitz, to give a Jewish get. When this was only done after many years, Stephanie Bruker sued for damages arising for breach of his contractual agreement. The Supreme Court will address whether damages arising out of a religious undertaking may be awarded.

If there had been a prenuptial agreement, this dispute may have been avoided. In a prenuptial agreement, the man and woman can agree to submit to binding arbitration before a Beth Din in the event that they have separated and intend to divorce. If in the ruling the Beth Din orders the giving of a get, this would be enforceable in a civil court as an arbitration decision. In addition, in Ontario, the civil divorce proceeding can be delayed until such time as any religious impediments to remarriage are removed, meaning the issuing of a get. Attorneys should be aware that once the divorce has been granted, this leverage no longer exists. The issue of the get should be addressed before the civil divorce has been granted.

No joy in autism

What a true "joy" that Michael Moon is verbal, a talented painter and able to integrate with his peers ("Art, lecture project part of Autism Awareness Month," CJN, Oct. 19). Yet many, or even most, children who are affected by autism are non-verbal, self-injurious and unable to cope with basic life skills, such as toileting, dressing and feeding themselves.

No where in the article was applied behavioural analysis therapy (ABA) mentioned. Early intervention is critical to helping children with a diagnosis of autism spectrum disorder learn to lead a successful and independent life.

What a gift to hear your child say, "Mommy, I love you" for the first time. It's music to the heart of an exhausted parent. What a shame when the entire classroom receives a birthday party invitation and you find out that your son or daughter with autism was excluded.

There truly is no joy in autism. There is acceptance, amelioration and the determination of parents to help their child or children speak, learn and live a life of quality and independence.

I should know. I am the mother of two young sons with autism, and the greatest joy is their innocent smiles. If only the community would embrace those who are different, we would truly be a better world for it.

Curbside tfillin pushers

I have to admit that I'm a little perplexed by Yoni Goldstein's assertion that someone encouraging you to put on tfillin each morning or uphold kashrut is imparting a dangerous message ("The danger of curbside tfillin pushers," CJN, Oct. 26). I have some suggestions for him.

If you don't over-tighten the hand tfillin, there's really no possibility of cutting off the circulation to your fingers.

And if you watch the blintzes and kishke, you can control your cholesterol levels quite easily.

Searching for his birth mother

Since 1990 I have been searching for my birth mother, Rosa Pollak. She was born on Feb. 15, 1924, and married Shaier Pollak, a shoemaker, on June 7, 1945 in Orosken, Romania. Rosa was in displaced person camps at Landsberg and Buchberg. She was sent to Munich, where I was born on June 28, 1946, and given the name Meier Pollak. We were separated as of July 14, 1946. I was adopted in 1950 in the United States by Dr. Joseph Factor and his wife, Bernice.

I would appreciate hearing from anyone who has any information about my mother.

Perspectives

A pilgrimage to a post-Shoah Hungary

By JOSEPH YOSSI ADLER

Mauthausen is situated near Linz, Austria, on a mountaintop surrounded by scenic hills and valleys in the picturesque Austrian countryside. Driving up to the town, one cannot ignore the Mauthausen McDonald's and other assorted tourist-oriented shops that dot the scenic landscape on route to our destination. Then one is starkly and suddenly confronted by the brute ugliness forever associated with the town of Mauthausen, the tall and intimidating prison walls of Mauthausen concentration camp. This is the camp where my father was interned during the war, and from where he was later sent to two of its sub-camps, first Melk and then Ebensee. Both sub-camps are within a couple of hours of Mauthausen.

My father, Isser Adler, my brother, Eli, and I recently returned from our trip to Hungary, Austria and Romania. Budapest served as our home base because it was equidistant to the two principal destinations we intended to visit: Mauthausen and Satu-Mare, Romania, our father's hometown and the birthplace of the Satmar Chassidic movement.

I thought I was prepared psychologically, knowing full well that his was going to be a difficult and bittersweet trip, given that this was our father's first visit to Europe in more than 60 years. Visiting this continent as a Holocaust survivor with his two children would understandably evoke painful memories of life under Nazi rule and its impact on our family. My father lost his mother and father and four of his younger siblings, including his 1½-year-old sister. This was the reason he had not returned to see his hometown, Satu-Mare, since the end of the war. Now he wished to visit the grave site of his grandfather, after whom my brother Eli was named. For a very long time, my father had expressed regret over the fact that he had not made this voyage; now he was ready.

Though he was prepared to visit his birthplace, our father was understandably disinclined to visit Mauthausen with us, where, along with its sister camps located within its vicinity, he had been interned during the war. He even attempted to dissuade my brother and me from going altogether. We persisted, because we hoped that this visit would help us understand what our father had experienced there.

Eli and I have been exposed to plenty of material about the Holocaust, including the stories my father had recounted to us since we were children. Still, none of that was like actually being there in person. I walked through the camp trying very hard to feel what it must have been like for my father and others, but between the bright clear September day and the countless monochromatic concentration camp images seared into my memory, I just could not feel what I thought I should have felt. The well-preserved gas chambers, crematoria, detention cells, ghastly instruments of torture and grim barracks all looked too familiar to me from my extensive exposure to the Holocaust, so I am still, weeks later, troubled that the scene did not bring me to tears.

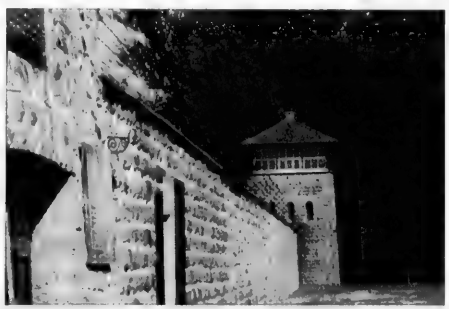
Interestingly, I was considerably more moved by our visit to Satu-Mare, where our father was born and lived before the war. The principal purpose of our trip to Europe was to pray at my grandfather's grave site in Satu-Mare and to otherwise pay homage to the only concrete structure that marked the memory of our father's progenitors.

The cemetery was bordered in by an eight-foot-high wall and lined with barbed wire. There were no signs on these walls indicating that this was a cemetery, simply a few Stars of David that pointed to the Jewish character of this plot of land that seemed to take up a large city block. As I entered the cemetery, I felt a profound sense of loss and that I was somehow eerily disturbing the peace in this wide stretch of land housing the hundreds of tombstones. I was taken aback as I sensed a whirlwind of emotion overtake me. It was as if the tombstones of hundreds of Jewish men, women and children cried out at me, pleading with me to take notice of their lives and deaths.

It is likely that most of the graves of the deceased have not been visited in generations, their children and extended families having died under Nazi rule. I suspect the same is true of the countless other abandoned cemeteries that sprinkle the eastern European landscape where Jews once lived and thrived.

I also felt a deep sense of connection with the lives that once occupied Satu-Mare's vibrant streets. Surrounded by death, I was acutely aware of life. How large a Jewish community must Satu-Mare have been! The dates on the tombstones indicated quite clearly that the vast majority died in the years just prior to the war. The cemetery therefore had much unused space in it to house other deceased members of Satu-Mare, whose lives should have ended in a natural way and whose remains should have been buried there. Yet, approximately 90 per cent of the Satu-Mare Jews were in fact murdered by the Nazis in Auschwitz and then cremated or buried in unmarked mass graves. Historians estimate that approximately 18,000 Jews from the Satu-Mare environs were transported to Auschwitz in May and June 1944. Virtually a whole community wiped out, with no one to pick up the broken pieces or to mourn their absence.

Joseph Adler's father, Isser, in the Satu-Mare cemetery



Mauthausen concentration camp in Mauthausen, Austria.

As I walked across the largely unkempt grounds of the cemetery, I sensed that these people led ordinary lives and had been committed to the faith and tradition of their people. The inscriptions described men and women of valour, of commitment to charity, community, Torah study and good deeds. Why then was this outstanding and upright community snuffed out in such a brutal and unforgiving manner? What in God's name would warrant their utter decimation in such a brutal fashion? I was at a loss for words and emotionally distressed as these questions popped up in my mind and as I traversed the silent and ghostly cemetery.

Following our daylong visit to Satu-Mare, our guide drove our tired souls back to Budapest. Along the way to and from Satu-Mare, we had passed by several familiar-sounding names of villages, towns and cities with previously vibrant Jewish communities, many of which formed the backbone of Hungarian Chassidism. Today, this locale is virtually bereft of Jews, except of course, those such as us, who returned to these parts in an effort to see Jewish life as it once was.

Budapest evoked similar feelings when we visited its Jewish quarter. Several of the synagogues that survived the war are still considered by Europeans to be architectural wonders. One is nevertheless left with the deep and sad impression that the war so brutally interrupted Jewish life there, and that the remaining or returning Jews are living in a time warp, attempting to rebuild a vanquished world.

The current state of Jewish life in Budapest was less difficult to handle than the now-destroyed Jewish community of Satu-Mare. There are many signs that Budapest's Jewish community is growing significantly and is reasserting itself in ways not seen since before the war. A renaissance of Jewish life in Budapest is emerging: Jewish schools, restaurants, museums and community and outreach organizations are being established and expanded. No matter what our enemies have intended in the past, I do believe that the Jewish people appear destined to establish their important presence in Hungary once again.

This Jewish rebirth in Hungary is little comfort to my father, though, as he laments what was and what could have been. He bears bitter feelings for the country in which he was born and raised. Hungary became a Nazi ally during the war; its anti-Semites were at least as ruthless as the Nazis themselves, and the sights and sounds of the Hungarian landscape, including his hometown, which is predominately Hungarian in language and in culture, bring back memories of loss and devastation.

I am eternally thankful that my brother and I had the opportunity to return with our father to his birthplace. Our father was an enriching and ever so nurturing guide. This is a trip that we will forever cherish and will never forget.

Joseph Adler is a lawyer in Toronto.

Opinions

Senseless fate, meaningful destiny

Recently, the absurdity of fate has made headlines. A gunman bursts into Montreal's Dawson College and kills an 18-year-old girl. A highway overpass collapses in Laval, killing five people. Beyond the headlines, everyone has been touched by an unexpected tragedy.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Fate's seeming absurdity engenders strange reactions. Some become superstitious, nervously clutching rabbit's feet and red strings for protection. Others become fatalistic. While visiting northern Israel during the Lebanese war, I asked our driver Ofer if he was worried about Katyushas hitting us. He said no, because "when it's your time, it's your time."

The question of fate's injustice makes philosophers of us all. Some say they can explain every twist of fate, certain that someone else's sins are the source of any suffering. Others are angry at God, upset that the utopian vision of their childhood has been shattered by reality.

I have an aversion to these philosophical ruminations. Personally, I prefer the view of R. Yanai, who says we don't know why the wicked prosper or the righteous suffer. By accepting fate as a mystery, at least it isn't an insult, an affront to the victims who are often blamed for their own misfortune.

Fate doesn't require an answer, it requires a response. Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik says there are two phases of life: fate and destiny. At times man is helpless, a passive object of fate. Other times, man can control his environment and is the master of his own destiny. Life fluctuates between fate and destiny. But even in our worst moments, fate doesn't reign supreme. We can always choose our response.

That's where a meaningful destiny is found. Do we respond with cowardice and confusion, or with humanity and spirituality?

Rabbi Seth Mandell directs camps for children who have lost a family member to terror. He began this project in memory of his son Koby, who was murdered in a terror attack. Seth told me a story about a girl in his camp who was so grief-stricken that she started cutting herself on the wrist. On the first day of camp, the girl's counsellor saw the cut and remarked that "time heals all wounds." The girl replied angrily, "It does not," a reference to all wounds, psychic and physical. The counsellor persevered in befriending the girl. Toward the end of camp, she stopped cutting herself and the wound healed. Noticing this, the counsellor lightheartedly remarked, "I guess time does heal all wounds." The girl responded, "No, it does not… But love heals all wounds."

This is a formula for transforming fate into destiny. Fate may cut us deeply, leaving us hurt and confused. But with a bit of love, we can find a way to heal our wounds and reclaim control of our destiny.

We must act to free the soldiers

Recently, I gave an audience of 200 involved Jews in Montreal a pop quiz.

"How many of you have heard of Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser, and Eldad Regev," I asked. Most hands shot up proudly, as people recognized the names of the three Israelis kidnapped this summer – and still held hostage by Hamas and Hezbollah.

I then asked: "How many of you have done anything to support their families or demand their release?" Every single hand dropped, dejectedly.

Shame on us. How could we observe the Jewish holidays without imagining even briefly what it must have been like for these three families with a son, a brother, absent from the table? How could we celebrate without empathizing with these three young men, caught in a hellish purgatory devised to impose pain on them, their families, the State of Israel and the Jewish people?

We cannot sit idly by anymore. We must act.

There are two kinds of constructive responses to the hostage crisis. We can reach out to the three affected families with the simple message of "anachnu eetchem," we are with you. Letting these people, wracked by worry, know through cards, letters, children's drawings and little gifts that they are not alone is important. It strengthens them by placing their personal predicament in the broader sweep of Jewish history, the Israeli narrative, and the modern struggle between democracies and Islamist terror. Small gestures can't save the boys, but they can lighten the load, even momentarily, that these three families have borne since the summer with grace.

Gil Troy in Montreal

The person-to-person contact is easy. And, as my family discovered when we tried to help the three soldiers Hezbollah kidnapped – and murdered – in October 2000, the rewards can be tremendous. We as a family bonded so deeply with one of the families, that of Benny Avraham, of blessed memory, that my children now have a special set of Israeli "grandparents."

The greater challenge is determining what kind of political efforts will facilitate their release. This requires a sophisticated analysis of the dynamics surrounding the two separate kidnappings – that of Gilad Shalit, a 19-year-old with a shy smile, by Hamas on the Gaza border; and that of Ehud Goldwasser, a 31-year-old engineer, and Eldad Regev, a 26-year-old pre-law student, by Hezbollah just south of Lebanon.

Clearly, direct pressure on the two terrorist organizations is not likely to work. But constant, relentless, constructive pressure on their supporters or neighbours might help. We need to mobilize a vast coalition of Jews and non-Jews to bombard Lebanese officials and activists for the Palestinian cause – as well as western diplomats who interact with Palestinian and Lebanese officials – with a simple message: free the kidnapped victims today.

Palestinians seeking a resumption of western aid must know that until Shalit is home again, no aid will flow. And those who support the Palestinian cause, waving the flag of humanitarianism, should be challenged to try saving a young kid caught in the crossfire. "Treat him as a human. Make a stand for our common humanity," we should say.

Similarly, as the Lebanese government begs the international community for reconstruction aid, all assistance should be contingent on arranging the release of Goldwasser and Regev. This summer's ceasefire was supposed to secure their release. We cannot allow the world to forget their fates.

In late September, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper refused to join a massive pile-on against Israel at the Francophonie summit. Most of the other 72 countries were ready to approve a resolution lamenting Lebanon's suffering and not Israel's. Standing on principle, Harper forced the leaders of the world's French-speaking nations to acknowledge the suffering of everyone caught in the crossfire. Since then, many have asked how they can thank Harper, and they have responded logically by donating money to his party, by joining his party and by seeking effective candidates who can win in contested districts.

Another way to salute Harper is to emulate his example. We have an opportunity to stand on principle, to rally around a seemingly hopeless cause, and make a statement affirming humanity, democracy and civilization. If we fail, there are at least three families in Israel who will remain grateful for our efforts.

The 'how to' of 'never again'

The deed preceded the word – before we knew what to call it, before we knew it as an entity beyond the immediate horror, there was genocide.

Genocide: the eradication, extermination, evaporation of a nation, a people. No stranger to history, this crime was not conceptualized – not given a name and a definition – until 1943. It was a Lithuanian Jewish lawyer – a refugee from Nazi Germany – who first coined the term, hammered out a definition, and laboured to have genocide recognized as a crime under international law.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Raphael Lemkin watched as Hitler came to power and Nazi Germany spread its web of influence throughout Europe. Already a public prosecutor in Warsaw, he struggled to define a crime that as yet had no name. Disturbed by the ferocious pogroms against the Jews of eastern Europe at the turn of the century, the massacre of Armenian people during World War I, and the slaughter of the Assyrian people in Iraq 15 years later, Lemkin wondered why homicide – the murder of an individual – was universally regarded as criminal, but engineering the disappearance of an entire people was not. A combination of historical sensitivity and keen observation of the progress of Nazi ideology impelled him to shape what he first termed the "crime of barbarity."

What Lemkin observed in Nazi-dominated Europe helped him shape his concept. Lemkin understood that it took successive steps to lead to the destruction of a people. These steps included designating a particular group as "outsiders"; setting up conditions and constraints that would lead to the group's physical destruction or cultural dissolution; physical and mental violence; dehumanization; and preventing births or taking away the group's children and raising them without knowledge of their identity.

Lemkin saw such actions as ways that perpetrator cultures disrupted the "national pattern" of the targeted group. He understood that, under certain conditions, one's fellow citizens, the government and the legal system could turn against a segment of the population and become its enemy.

Ultimately, the goal of these actions was to eradicate the group entirely, primarily by murderous violence. By combining "geno," from the Greek word for people or tribe, with "cide," from the Latin word for killing, Lemkin came up with the word "genocide." But unable to rally international intervention on behalf of the besieged Jews of Europe, Lemkin lost most of his family in the Holocaust.

What good then came of giving this atrocity a name?

Lemkin understood that it had to be named in order to be fought. In 1948, thanks to his unceasing efforts, the United Nations accepted the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, affirming it to be an international crime, and providing ammunition to counter future genocides.

Sadly, that ammunition is rarely fired. Although, once acknowledged, the horrors of the Holocaust should have made genocide unthinkable, that has not been the case. In the past 20 years, two million people have been killed and twice that many displaced in the southern and central regions of the Sudan. The primary victims were the Dinka, Nuer and Nuba people. In the former Yugoslavia (especially in Bosnia) and particularly in Rwanda, the horrors were condemned largely in retrospect, when it was too late to help. And now, genocidal violence grows in Chechnya and in the Sudan's western region of Darfur.

Equally disturbing, that ammunition is increasingly misfired. Like the term "holocaust," the term "genocide" is misapplied willfully or haphazardly in order to cast a shadow over one's opponents and to delegitimate them in the public eye. Lemkin hoped to empower the nations of the world to combat the one-sided violence that reduces a peaceable people to nothingness. It's one of history's bitter ironies that a term forged by a Jewish refugee in the ashes of the Holocaust is increasingly and unjustly aimed at the Jewish state.

In the end, such wanton use of language will so dilute the public conception of the term genocide that it can no longer serve meaningfully to combat the barbarous crimes that Lemkin saw and foresaw.

What can we do to prevent this cheapening of important language? We can educate ourselves about genocide, so that we know what it is and don't, ourselves, throw the term around randomly. And we can apply it where it rightly belongs, speaking out in the way that our legacy demands.

The Kirshner File

Russia hews to a two-track policy in Mideast

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert went to Moscow late last month to mark the 15th anniversary of Israel's renewal of diplomatic relations with Russia. This was doubtless an important theme of Olmert's trip. Olmert had said that he considered Israel's relationship with Russia to be important, expressed a desire to improve it and described Russia's president, Vladimir Putin, as "a friend" who "would not act against Israel's interests."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Striking a similarly upbeat tone, Putin – the first sitting Russian president to visit Israel – praised Russia's ties with Israel. Saying that they had been "completely transformed" in the past few years and were now based on "mutual trust," he offered to do everything he could to contribute to a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Beyond the high-flown rhetoric, Olmert found himself at odds with Putin over a number of key issues.

Olmert complained that Hezbollah had acquired Russian anti-tank missiles and had used them to devastating effect during the second war in Lebanon in July and August. He voiced concerns about Russian arms sales to Syria, one of Israel's most intractable enemies. He sought an explanation as to why Russia had invited a Hamas delegation to Moscow last March after other members of the Quartet – the European Union and the United States – and Canada had boycotted Hamas. He had questions about Russia's technological assistance to Iran's nuclear program.

Olmert raised the missile issue because about 50 of the 118 Israeli soldiers killed during the 34-day war in Lebanon were struck by Russian-made Kornet, Metis, Sagger and TOW missiles. Shortly after the war ended in mid-August, an Israeli delegation visited Moscow to discuss the issue. Israel did not accuse Russia of directly supplying the missiles to Hezbollah, but claimed that Hezbollah had acquired them from Syria and Iran.

According to reports, the Israeli army captured 39 such missiles, some of them in their original packaging, which proved capable of piercing the thick armour of Israel's top-rated Merkava tank. Israeli diplomats showed their Russian hosts photographs of the missiles and copies of the documentation, but Russian foreign ministry officials insisted that Russia – one of the world's top arms exporters – maintains strict controls over weapons sales to prevent them from falling into the wrong hands. Russian Defence Minister Sergei Ivanov said that Israel had provided no incontrovertible evidence that Hezbollah had obtained Russian missiles.

In his talks with Olmert, Ivanov changed his tune a bit, admitting that Hezbollah had indeed deployed Russian missiles, but claiming that Hezbollah had also used U.S. and Israeli weapons. Olmert apparently did not respond to Ivanov's curious claim that Israeli and American military equipment had somehow reached Hezbollah. But Olmert did say he was "satisfied" with Ivanov's assurance that Russia would take firm steps to ensure that Hezbollah would not acquire Russian missiles in the future.

As for Russian arms sales to Syria, Putin told Olmert that Israel had no need to worry, since only defensive weapons had been sold to the Syrians. In line with an earlier pledge, Putin promised that he would not do anything to endanger Israel's security.

During his visit to Israel in April 2005, Putin gave the then-prime minister, Ariel Sharon, identical assurances. He told Sharon that he had vetoed the sale of long-range missiles to Syria, and that Syria would receive only short-range anti-aircraft missiles.

Russia's relations with Hamas were a topic of debate as well. Last February, shortly after Hamas' victory in Palestinian parliamentary elections, Putin invited a Hamas delegation for talks in Moscow with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov. The invitation was issued after major western countries demanded, in vain, that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce terrorism and abide by an assortment of previous agreements that the Palestinian Authority had signed with Israel.

Putin's decision irked Israel. Its foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, warned that the Russian invitation could be a "slippery slope" that could prompt other countries to turn a blind eye to Hamas' charter, which calls for Israel's destruction. Another Israeli cabinet minister, Meir Sheetrit, dispensed with diplomatic niceties and accused Russia of "stabbing Israel in the back."

Russia's view was far different.

Putin said that talks might nudge Hamas to the negotiating table, while Ivanov said that the West had no alternative but to deal with a movement that had won a legitimate democratic election.

In his discussions with the Russian leadership on this incendiary topic, Olmert urged Moscow to adopt a policy that encourages moderates rather than radicals in the Arab world. Lavrov replied that, while he does not support extremist forces, he wants to communicate with them to influence their policies positively. Lavrov counselled patience, urging Olmert not to expect an immediate shift of Hamas' policy toward Israel.

But within days of Lavrov's soothing statement, Mahmoud Zahar, the Hamas foreign minister, confirmed Israel's worst fears. "We will not give up one inch of Palestine," he declared, branding Israel as an "abomination" and "a tumour on Palestinian land that has no legitimacy." He added, "We will never recognize Israel, and the Zionists will share the fate of the Crusaders and the English who left the country."

Ehud Olmert and Vladimir Putin meet in Moscow.

On Iran, Olmert informed the Russians that Israel will not tolerate a nuclear-armed Iran. Lavrov argued that Iran does not pose "a real threat" to Israel's security.

Putin, while in Israel last year, soft-pedalled the issue, too. "We are working with Iran for peaceful nuclear purposes," he said, echoing Iran's claim that its nuclear program is solely designed to generate electricity.

Israel dismisses this argument, contending that Iran – a major oil and gas producer that is in no need of nuclear power– is intent on destroying the Jewish state. In a diatribe against Israel two weeks ago, Iran's fiery president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, predicted that Israel would soon disappear.

Russia, Iran's chief supplier of nuclear technology, is currently building six nuclear reactors in Iran and is bidding to construct 20 more. But Russia has not sold Iran sensitive technologies that would enable its scientists to enrich uranium or produce plutonium.

The Russians regard their dealings with Iran in primarily economic terms, but Israel interprets them as a potential threat to its very existence.

To placate Israel, Russia launched an Eros B satellite on Israel's behalf last April to monitor Iran's nuclear activities and long-range missiles. Nevertheless, Israel remains deeply concerned by Russia's co-operation with Iran.

Russia has called on Israel not to even think of attacking Iran's nuclear facilities. Last week, Putin said, "Any action against Iran will end in disaster." But Israel would be hard-pressed to wipe out these installations because Russia has sold Iran the highly sophisticated Tor M 1 9M330 air defence system.

Moscow's business-as-usual attitude toward Iran is a reflection of its non-ideological two-track Middle Eastern policy.

On the one hand, Russia is interested in forging friendly relations with Israel, a nation it virtually shunned and demonized during much of the Soviet era until 1991.

On the other hand, Russia wants to reclaim the influence it lost in Arab states following the collapse of the Soviet Union.

"Russia's policy is neither pro-Arab nor pro-Israel," Lavrov said in a recent interview with the Russian daily Pravda. "It is aimed at securing Russian national interests. Maintaining close and friendly ties with the Arab states and Israel is among them."

Probably more than any of his predecessors, Putin has cultivated Israel. "We have added close and constructive co-operation with Israel to our traditional ties with the Arab countries," he said this past summer.

Nowhere is this better reflected than in Israel's commercial relations with Russia. Bilateral annual trade hovers around the $2-billion (US) mark, more than Russia's combined trade with the entire Arab world, and Israel buys a lot of its crude oil from Russia.

In addition, Israel and Russia – which has a Muslim population of some 20 million and has fought two wars in Chechnya – co-operate in the field of counter-terrorism.

Russia and Israel have also joined forces to supply India with a Phalcon airborne reconnaissance system.

Russia, in the main, votes against Israel at the United Nations. Yet Russia supports the "road map" peace plan, as well as all other efforts to defuse the Arab-Israeli dispute, and it's working to free three Israeli soldiers held by Hezbollah and Hamas.

So for Israel, Russia's Mideast policy is a mixed blessing.

Parents do their homework to choose right Jewish school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto parents who want a Jewish education for their children can choose from 39 day-care centres and preschools, 27 day schools, and 44 supplementary programs, spanning a wide range of religious and educational philosophies.

To narrow their options – or fine-tune their already narrowed-down choices – about 350 parents attended last week's fourth annual Jewish Education Fair, formerly titled "Options in Jewish Education."

The event – held this year at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's (CHAT's) south campus – is co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto.

Thirty schools had display tables, as did Canadian Jewish Congress, which is launching a new website (fundingfairness.ca) on Nov. 1 to provide information about government funding for faith-based education. CJC works with UJA Federation and the BJE, among others, on the issue.

For Sidura Ludwig, 30, cost is a significant issue.

She said Toronto parents are lucky to have such a range of choices in Jewish education, but she finds it "very frustrating" that Jewish day school tuition is significantly less expensive in Winnipeg, where she grew up, because the province of Manitoba provides funding to all independent schools, including faith-based ones.

Ludwig's younger sister recently graduated from Grade 12 at Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education, where the maximum annual amount that parents pay is $6,825 per child. Comparable tuition at CHAT is now $15,650. However, Gray Academy head of school Rory Paul noted in a subsequent phone interview that the cost of living in general is higher in Toronto than in Winnipeg.

Ludwig and her husband Jason Schron, who runs a business, are the parents of a 15-month-old boy, and they are expecting their second child in April. Jewish day school is the only option the modern Orthodox couple will consider.

"We'll just have to make that happen, however it's going to happen," said Ludwig, who used to work at Associated Hebrew Schools in marketing and communications.

She noted that many people of her generation have pursued more than one degree and are still paying off student loans.

Aaron Kotick, a 28-year-old director of sales for an education company, and his wife Jasmine Eliav, a PhD student, have a 10-week-old daughter. They were "looking to price [the cost of Jewish education] out, so we know how much to save," Kotick said.

Assia and Felix, a Latvian-born couple who preferred not to have their surname in print, said they hadn't yet decided on day school or supplementary school for their four-year-old son. Assia, who like her husband works with computers, said they were considering day schools but not those that were religiously "strict."

She added that she wants her son "to know that he's Jewish, and to know about Jewish tradition, culture and history."

Location and cost are also important factors for them, her husband added.

Jonathan and Hannah Boulakia, the parents of a three-year-old and a newborn, said they weren't sure what they're looking for. "It's a hard decision," said Jonathan, a lawyer, referring to the question of day school versus public school.

Because they speak French at home, French-language education is a factor for them. Cost, "general environment of the school," and, above all, the quality of education will figure in their decision, he said.

As an alumnus of the public school system and a Jewish supplementary school, he said he's "a believer in the public system. I think it served us well." However, they would also consider Jewish day schools, he added.

Ann Rastin and her husband Joe attended the education fair having already decided on a day-school education for their two-year-old son. But the couple, who own their own company, were considering schools as diverse as Leo Baeck Day School, which is affiliated with the Reform movement, and Associated, a community school where the religious teachings hew to Orthodoxy but the student body is diverse.

Ann's main focus is finding a school "where we'll be comfortable," she said.

At least two schools had students on hand to answer parents' questions.

Sidra Rosen, Leo Baeck's registrar, invited prospective parents to an upcoming open house, in addition to fielding their questions. "I think you really have to come and see," she said.

A BJE handout, based on a document from United Synagogue Day School, advises parents to ask about things such as Jewish philosophy, synagogue affiliation, academic track record, adherence to Ministry of Education guidelines, staff-to-student ratio, support services and allergy policies. It also recommends speaking to parents of children at the school.

In Toronto, there are about 11,100 students in Jewish day schools and about 5,300 in supplementary schools, said federation spokesperson Howard English. Overall numbers are up slightly over last year; however, enrolment in elementary day schools is down about one per cent, he said. High school enrolment is up about three per cent.

Na'amat president juggles volunteer work, business life

'There is no better feeling than to go to Israel and see the work we have done in action'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As the daughter of Holocaust survivors, Sue Holtzman, the new president of Na'amat Canada, Toronto, knows first-hand the importance of supporting Israel.

"[My personal history] has shaped my beliefs and my commitment to Israel," says Holtzman, 55, who has belonged to the organization for 34 years.

She's been in Canada since 1956, when she left Hungary with her parents, and she says that many Na'amat members are women like herself, "second and third generation of Holocaust survivors who are dedicated to helping children in need in Israel.

"There are fewer and fewer survivors left. We are the generation carrying on."

A full-time collections manager with CIBC, Holtzman, a mother of two, says she juggles her volunteer career with her business life, because "those who have good jobs and good health have to give back. If we don't, who will?"

She was first introduced to Na'amat as a young bride, she says, "and I was lucky enough to fall into a wonderful network of women. I met a woman at my first meeting in 1972 who lived in my apartment building, and we still go to meetings together."

Over the years, she says, she has taken on a number of positions, including recording secretary, fundraising chair, and club president.

Sue Holtzman

"Fundraising has become more difficult in recent years, and Jewish organizations have fallen on tough times. There are lots of organizations and fewer dollars to go around," she says.

"With so many causes, we have to bring the message forward that we are doing good work, and we need help."

Every three years, her organization takes on a major project.

"There is always something that has to be done. We're now in the midst of our 'Swing into Action' project, which entails rebuilding playgrounds at our day-care centres," Holtzman says.

"There is no better feeling than to go to Israel and see the work we have done in action," she adds.

"When I stayed at Na'amat's agricultural high school, which has a working farm, I met kids who could have ended up on the street. Here they were, working hard."

Added to the challenge of fundraising, she says, is the challenge of increasing Na'amat's membership. "Many women are busy with full-time careers and raising families. If they do want to join an organization, there are many choices out there. We have to work at offering them something they can't get elsewhere.

"I believe that it's the friends that keep women coming back. Working together for a common cause is what bonds them. With more than 400 members in Toronto, we have groups for women of every age, including young singles, seniors, and a group for daughters and granddaughters of Na'amat members."

Women can acquire a number of business skills by doing volunteer work, Holtzman says. "They do public speaking, event planning, bookkeeping, editing – a variety of skills they can take into the workforce."

Jewish Life

A message about hunger

By RABBI DAVID SEED

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

When I speak to colleagues or friends about Toronto's Jewish community, I always mention the number and variety of the city's kosher restaurants. I joke with them that you can visit Toronto for at least a week and eat in a different kosher restaurant for lunch and dinner without ever repeating the same type of meal. It speaks to the vibrancy of the Jewish community here, but also to our love of food and the role it plays in our tradition and rituals.

Food is an important focus in the Torah, as we see in this week's portion of Lech Lecha, and, for that matter, throughout the entire book of Bereshit. The reading begins with God's command to Abram (later to be known as Abraham) to "Go forth from your native land and from your father's house to the land that I will show you." Nevertheless, his time in the land of Canaan is short-lived, for no sooner has he traversed the land do we read, "There was a famine in the land, and Abram went down to Egypt to sojourn there, for the famine was severe in the land." (Genesis 12:10) (Note that the famine is mentioned not once, but twice in the same verse.)

The famine that Abram and Sarai (later to be known as Sarah) encounter is only one of many that drive our ancestors out of the Promised Land. For example, in Genesis 26:1, Isaac is forced to flee because of hunger, and then in both 42:1 and 43:1, Joseph's brothers venture down to Egypt because of famine in the land of Canaan.

Rashi, in commenting on Abram's plight, suggests that God was testing the patriarch, as He did so many times throughout his life. Would Abram still stand with God in spite of the fact he was being forced to leave that which had been given to him? As difficult as it might have been to leave, Abram never forgot the land and kept the hope of returning close to his heart.

Yet, this experience of famine and hunger has always been a part of the fabric of the Jewish people. The fact that we're so scrupulous about providing for the hungry at Pesach is just one example. And the opposite is true as well. Recently we concluded the festival of Sukkot, in which we took note of and celebrated the blessings of God's bounty on this earth. We learn that we should never take our food for granted, at any point in our lives.

Unfortunately, we still live in a world in which, by rights, there should be sufficient food for everyone. With all our modern agricultural wonders, no one should go hungry today, but they do. Whether it's poor distribution, war or disease, millions go hungry every day, either because they're forced to leave their land to escape hunger or because they lack the means to seek even the most meagre scraps of food.

Darfur is one name that comes to mind when we speak of hunger, but we must never forget that there are many people in our own country and community, both Jewish and non-Jewish, who don't have enough food to eat, who go to bed with pangs of hunger in their stomachs. Organizations such as Mazon: A Jewish Response to Hunger attempt to alleviate this problem in the name of the Jewish community, and so that all may know that the lessons of hunger with which our ancestors had to contend are never far from us.

God tested our ancestors through famine to see if they would remember their precious land, and they remembered. And we are also tested, to make sure we don't forget the hunger that afflicts so many in the world.

It's a test we must strive to meet.

A Reform Jewish Day School

Lessons once learned

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Once the High Holy Days have concluded, it seems that Jewish life returns to normal and routines begin again. Yet some of the most interesting Torah readings are beginning.

Starting this week and for a while to come, we meet and spend time with our Jewish ancestors. Abraham and Sarah begin a journey of discovery that they pass on to their son Isaac. He, together with his wife Rebecca, will likewise add their unique piece and pass the journey on to their children. One son, Jacob, will add his unique part and pass a legacy on to his children, who will become the 12 tribes of Israel.

This dynamic, world-changing chain of events begins with the words God utters to Abraham: "lech lecha." It seems to be the beginning of a journey but, in truth, there is another journey that each person begins on his or her own, and eventually the two life journeys will intersect.

According to Judaism, the potential for life begins in the womb. As the body of the infant is developing, so is its soul. The Talmud discusses the activities of a fetus while it develops within the mother. The passage begins by describing the physical positioning of the fetus: it appears "folded in" upon itself in its tucked position. There is a light present that allows it to see to the ends of the world, and the fetus is taught the entire Torah from beginning to end while it is developing inside its mother.

The image – of a fetus in its most protected time engaged in the highest spiritual pursuit – is a beautiful one. The fetus appears "folded in" because its focus is inward. It can see the entire world and is being taught the tools it will need to function positively within that world. And yet the Talmud concludes by saying that once the infant is born, an angel touches the child's upper lip and all the knowledge is forgotten.

This conclusion is perplexing. Why spend nine months mastering the secrets of the universe only to forget them when your life begins?

Possibly the answer lies within the problem itself. One can accept the image of an unborn child glimpsing wisdom that is hidden, but can we truly understand the status of the soul at this stage? The problem is not in the learning – it is in the forgetting. Yet this is the very message of the image.

As we journey through life, we seem to be learning and growing. Yet the talmudic text has told us that all knowledge we attain is truly a remembering of our lessons in the womb. Therefore, we do not discover new horizons but rediscover long-forgotten ones.

When God tells our ancestors to begin a journey of "lech lecha," the second word in the phrase "lecha" means "to you." The spiritual journey is one that leads the person inward to a rediscovery of self. It is the remembrance of lessons taught to us by an angel that fused with our souls and informed our essence.

The High Holy Days may indeed be over for this year, but the exciting part is only beginning.

Jewish Life

Archeology, espresso and archives

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

Most of us are familiar with espresso coffee, either on its own or in its various forms from cappuccinos to lattes. But how many know that Jews were among the first to import coffee into Italy in the early 17th century.

In fact, Jews have had a long history in the Italian peninsula going back to republican times in Rome. We have accounts that Jews were among the supporters of Julius Caesar. One of the earliest synagogues in the Mediterranean world was found amid the ruins of Ostia Antica, ancient Rome's port at the mouth of the Tiber River.

After the first Jewish Revolt against Rome, thousands of Jewish slaves were brought back to the Imperial City, where many of them worked on such grandiose building projects as the Flavian Amphitheatre, more popularly known as the Colosseum. Berenice, the daughter of Herod Agrippa I and the mistress of the Emperor Titus, who destroyed Jerusalem and the Second Temple, as well as building the Colosseum, was Jewish. Archeologists have turned up ancient Jewish tombs throughout Italy; among them are the famous catacombs of Rome.

It is estimated by some sources that Jews may have even constituted up to 10 per cent of the population of the Roman Empire at its height. All of this would change with the Second Jewish Revolt and the adoption of Christianity by Constantine as the official religion of the Empire circa 325 CE. The Emperor Julian the Apostate, circa 361-363 CE, briefly reversed official policy when he passed an edict to rebuild the Temple before his assassination in 363. Shortly thereafter, with the accession of the Emperor Theodosius, persecution of the Jews became official policy. The end of the western Roman Empire and the beginning of the so-called Dark Ages in the next century did not change much for the Jews.

By the time the veil of the Dark Ages lifts, there is once more evidence of a Jewish presence in Italy. Jews are involved in Italian life throughout the length of the peninsula, which by this time was fragmented among various states. By the later Middle Ages, the Aragonese of Spain, whose kingdom was centred on Barcelona, ruled a sizable part of Italy. When the Jews were expelled from Spain in 1492, the same edict applied to the Spanish possessions in Italy. Jews fled from places they had lived for centuries. More than 30,000 Jews left Sicily. Shortly thereafter, the first ghettos were established, taking their name from the district in Venice where Jews now lived.

This was also the time of the Italian Renaissance when western Europe was rediscovering the classical heritage of Greece and Rome, thanks to scholars such as Petrarch and Boccacio. The Renaissance started in Italy around the beginning of the 14th century. By the middle of the 15th century, there was a chair of Hebrew established at the University of Bologna, one of the oldest universities in Europe. But the Renaissance is most often associated with giants such as da Vinci and Michelangelo.

It was also the age of great patrons such as the Medicis. They founded a free port at Livorno and encouraged Jews to come and live there. It was in Livorno that Jews first imported coffee into Italy in the 17th century.

By the time the last Medici Grand Duke of Tuscany died in the 18th century, the Medicis had left an archive of three million documents. Of these, 40,000 dealt with the Jews of Tuscany. The Medici Archive Project (MAP) is digitizing and studying this collection. The first volume of this project will be published in Toronto by the University of Toronto Press.

The Medici Archive Project is giving us a fascinating insight into the realm of these merchant princes and is revealing the important role Jews played in this region that was at the heart of the Renaissance. As for my connection to Italy – my wife was born in the Trastevere district of Rome, the heart of the Jewish district for the past 2,000 years.

Those who are interested may wish to join me on a Jewish heritage tour to this wonderful land that the great Rashi called the most beautiful in the world. E-mail Merja Kerov of St. Clair Travel at merja@stclairtravel.com or call 416-654-9600.

Solving Israel's water crisis, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

As Israel looks to the skies for rain, we conclude our look at how it is trying to make each drop last.

Reservoirs old: Water problems in the Middle East are nothing new and neither are ingenious solutions. Archeologists have unearthed a network of reservoirs designed to turn the desert green. Located beneath an ancient Judean palace just south of Jerusalem, the waterworks was modified by the Persians who took control of the area from the Babylonians around 539 BCE. [http://tinyurl.com/y8b76v] Tel Aviv University archeologist Oded Lipschits has called the Ramat Rachel reservoirs and waterworks unparalleled in Eretz Yisrael. [http://tinyurl.com/wbsvq]

Reservoirs new: Although most immediately identified it with trees and making the desert bloom, the Jewish National Fund has long been involved in Israel's water economy. The country's network of 180 dams and reservoirs frees up "enough water to meet the needs of over 1.2 million Israelis each year." [http://tinyurl.com/npqja]

Desalination: "Nuclear desalination plant will be ready by 1971" reads the headline in the Dec. 18, 1965, edition of the Jerusalem Post. "President Lyndon Johnson has assured Prime Minister Levi Eshkol of U.S. willingness to help finance the joint U.S.-Israel nuclear desalination plant," the article states. [http://tinyurl.com/kehqq] The nuclear plant never saw the light of day, but last year Israel opened the largest desalination plant of its kind in the world. When it reaches full capacity, the Ashkelon seawater reverse osmosis plant will provide about 15 per cent of the country's domestic consumer demand. [http:// tinyurl.com/jmnzl]

The Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, has conducted an 18-month project titled Efficient Use of Limited Water Resources: Making Israel a Model State. You can read the recommendations about the viability of desalination and other critical aspects of Israel's water policy in the extensive English language site. [http://tinyurl. com/vpcq2]

Waste-water treatment and reuse: The high cost of desalination can make it prohibitively expensive for agricultural use. But since many crops can tolerate water of lower quality, treated waste water is seen as a source of water for irrigation. You can read more about this at Mekorot, Israel's national water company, [http://tinyurl.com /jowq2] and at the Stephen and Nancy Grand Water Research Institute based at the Technion in Haifa. [http://tinyurl. com/f5jo8]

Meanwhile, Business Week recently had a feature article about how Israel is exporting its water-management technology to parched regions of the globe. [http://tinyurl .com/eexdu] And CNET News has a fascinating feature titled Water Wizards in the Desert [http://tinyurl.com/kx6jq] as well as an enlightening photo gallery. [http://tinyurl. com/h3x3g]

Canals: One of the older proposals for restoring the Dead Sea to its traditional level is through digging a canal linking it to the Mediterranean Sea. The so-called Med-Dead Canal would deliver badly needed water to the Dead Sea, which is falling by a metre per year. The canal would also take advantage of the 400-metre drop between the two bodies of water to generate hydro-electric power. [http://tinyurl.com/kz5yr] But the route of that canal would take it through the Gaza Strip, and the United Nations passed a resolution condemning it in 1984. [http://tinyurl.com/j9rhv]

More recently, attention has turned to a similar project, the Red-Dead Canal, which would start in the Red Sea and travel north, downward through the Arava Valley shared by Jordan and Israel until it reaches the Dead Sea. [http://tinyurl.com/odgmg] So far this project has received support from Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority. This summer, it came a step closer to reality when the World Bank agreed to raise $15 million for a feasibility study. [http://tinyurl.com /yh9y4w] The king of Jordan enlisted famed British architect Lord Foster to work on the canal. [http://tinyurl.com/odgmg] On the other hand, the Friends of the Earth Middle East has raised several concerns about the project including a fear that the "unique Dead Sea mineral composition will certainly be altered by the release of waters" from the Red Sea. [http://tinyurl.com/ycxol6] The feasibility study will take about two years.

Weldrick Road renamed in honour of Lebovic brothers

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The name of a road in the City of Vaughan which will be an important route in the lives of Jewish generations to come has been officially changed in honour of the two men whose generosity is the financial force behind a new community campus.

Weldrick Road, west of Bathurst Street, was recently changed to Lebovic Campus Drive, in honour of philanthropists Joseph and Wolf Lebovic, the benefactors of the new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus at that location (Weldrick, east of Bathurst, will retain the same name). The dedication ceremony – held on the site of the campus – was attended by Jewish community and political leaders.

Spread across 50 acres on Bathurst Street, north of Rutherford Road, the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus – an initiative of UJA Federation's $250 million Tomorrow Campaign chaired by Lawrence Tanenbaum and Gerald Schwartz - is a direct response to the requirements of York Region's growing Jewish population. Serving the diverse recreational, educational, social, cultural and wellness needs of families and individuals alike, the campus will house a full recreation facility, an early childhood care centre, schools, a conference centre and multi-purpose theatre, a health and wellness clinic, a variety of meeting spaces, and agency offices.

"It takes great vision and foresight to understand the importance of building a Jewish Toronto for future generations, for people you may never meet or never know," said UJA Federation board chair, David Engel. "Years ago, other visionaries thought to create the Jewish infrastructure we have today: the hospitals, the community centres, synagogues, day schools and more. It is now our turn. We are indebted to people like the Lebovics who are leading the way."

"Over the years, we've seen the Jewish community move north and really become the salt of the earth," said Ontario finance minister Greg Sorbara. "Clearly, the Lebovic brothers know that it's the generosity of spirit that makes a community. This new campus is a testament to how much both of you care for not only the Jewish community, but all of the 12.5 million people who call this province home."

"Anyone can build a house, but the Lebovic brothers build communities," said Vaughan mayor, Michael DiBiase. "I'm so proud of the large and flourishing Jewish community in Vaughan. It is truly an example of how a group can come together and work for one common goal."

Other dignitaries attending the Lebovic street naming dedication included Thornhill Member of Parliament Susan Kadis; Mario Racco, the area's Member of the Legislature and York Region chair, Bill Fisch.

"I've been in the development business for fifty years, and I never thought I'd be standing here for this, but, here we are," said Leo Goldhar, chair of the Lebovic Campus steering committee. "With the backing of some special families we now call the founding families, we were able to purchase the 50 acres that has become the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus. We delivered what we promised."

"It is unbelievable what can be accomplished if you believe and are steadfast in your determination," said Leslie Gales, chair, Tomorrow Leadership Cabinet. "Joe and Wolf believed and look where their vision and belief have taken us."

"We never had any second thoughts about what we were doing," said Joseph Lebovic. "We always wanted this to be a great facility for the Jewish community and for the community in general, and I have no doubt it will be just that. We want to thank everyone who has helped make our dream a reality."

The Tomorrow Campaign also includes two other Jewish community campuses – in downtown Toronto and in the Bathurst and Sheppard area.

Ontario Jewish Archives launches virtual family tree workshops

Thanks to the generosity of a donor to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – UJA Federation's endowment arm - members of Toronto's Jewish community will soon know a lot more about their family's historical roots.

The donation, provided to the Foundation by Lynda Weinrib, will fund a series of six workshops on creating family trees online.

"My grandfather told me stories when I was a child and showed me the Book of Jewish Names," says Weinrib. "I couldn't appreciate it then and now I am very interested in learning more about Jewish history."

Starting in January 2007, the workshops will be held in three different locations in Toronto - downtown, mid-town and North York - in order to accommodate community members from across the city regardless of age.

Their purpose is to teach participants how to use the new Jewish genealogical databases on the Internet to conduct searches into their roots and then rely on a new software product called Family Tree Maker to create sophisticated family trees. The instructor is journalist and avid genealogist Bill Gladstone.

"These types of Internet resources came on board four to five years ago and have revolutionized this type of research, enhancing accessibility to the public and reducing the time involved in locating family-related information," explains Gladstone.

The course will be open and accessible to everyone in the community, but will target bar and bat mitzvah-aged youth who will be accompanied by one of their parents.

As a further incentive to get youngsters involved in this project, The Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora in Tel Aviv, offers three trips to Israel each year as prizes for the best family trees submitted by a bar or bat mitzvah. The UJA Federation Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) will work with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish schools to promote these workshops and encourage eligible students to participate.

"We are excited about tying these workshops to this competition in order to attract and raise awareness among bar and bat mitzvah-aged kids about the value of historical research through the investigation of their family trees," says Ellen Scheinberg, director of the OJA, which is coordinating this project. "By pairing them with a parent, these courses will inspire the children to delve into their roots and will enable their parents to share in this experience."

Project Northern Recovery

Eliya Halevi - Israel's Tiniest Hero

UJA Federation has begun Project Northern Recovery to relieve the ongoing emergency-situation in northern Israel, following this summer's terrorist rocket attacks. Project Northern Recovery, the next phase of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, will be allocating funds for among other initiatives, repairing damage to community facilities, such as hospitals and re-equipping them. The urgent ongoing needs of the north are illustrated through this story of courage to save little lives.

Baby Eliya was born on May 14, 2006, three months premature, weighing only one pound 12 ounces. Displaying an amazing determination to survive, his situation gradually stabilized under the expert care and attention of doctors and staff of the neonatal infant care unit (NIC) at the Rebecca Sieff Hospital in Safed (Tzfat).

With the outbreak of hostilities in the north, Eliya's father, David Halevi, voiced his concerns to the hospital staff about where the hospital's NIC unit was situated within the hospital.

"The unit was on the top floor of the hospital building, and Eliya's incubator was right near an external window, together with all the other infants," David recalls. "I thought that this was really dangerous. However, the hospital staff assured me that the hospital was out of range of any rockets that Hezbollah had in their arsenal, and that everything would be fine," he continues.

David Halevi with son Eliya.

On the evening of July 17th, their theories were proven wrong. The city of Safed came under fire with rockets landing very close to the hospital, shattering its plate glass windows.

"We were in our home on Kibbutz Amiad, only ten minutes drive from the hospital, when we heard the sirens go off."

David, who made aliyah from Los Angeles last year, recounts their traumatic experience. "We sped our way up to the hospital to see if little Eliya was safe. People were in a state of shock, but we realized that we had to get these babies out of harms way."

David personally assisted the hospital staff throughout the night, moving the entire NIC unit, including the infant patients, to a lower floor where they would be safe. "I think I will remember that feeling for the rest of my life, as I wheeled my son in his incubator to safety," says David. "I felt that this tiny, two-month old innocent human being, weighing only 2 pounds 12 ounces, had been part of another miracle by surviving this attack."

Two of the north's other major hospitals, Western Galilee Hospital in Nahariya and Rambam Medical Center in Haifa took direct rocket hits during the war and suffered extensive damage to the buildings and to medical equipment. With extraordinary acts of courage and bravery, doctors, nurses and paraprofessionals continued to care for the sick and wounded.

As part of its comprehensive plan for Rebuilding the Galilee, the Jewish Agency for Israel (UJA Federation's overseas agency) is investing in building vital communal infrastructure. As critical service providers for the community, hospitals that were directly hit require support, not only to return them to previous levels of working capacity, but to also offer community-wide assistance for those most in need from traumatized children to injured and chronically ill citizens.

Since that fateful evening, Eliya Halevi has undergone laser surgery on his eyes. He is still thriving and gaining weight steadily, having recently passed the 4 pounds, 4 ounces (2 kilo) mark.

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign launches new phase

Telethon volunteers raising funds for Project Northern Recovery

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

As UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 (IEC) begins its next phase, Project Northern Recovery, the push to help northern Israel recover from this summer's war against Hezbollah, is still motivating hundreds of Toronto volunteers to do what they can.

Last week's UJA Federation IEC telethons brought out 400 eager volunteers who helped raise more than $1.2 million.

The IEC – chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks – has so far raised over $68 million, with $18.5 million earmarked for Israel's emergency needs.

Project Northern Recovery is targeted to those who have not yet given an Israel Emergency Campaign gift by focusing on the emergency conditions that still exist in northern Israel.

"The purpose of Project Northern Recovery is to focus on the urgent long and short term needs of northern Israelis and to ensure that we raise $81 million for the Israel Emergency Campaign 2007," said Rohringer. "The money that we have raised to date and sent to Israel has helped substantially, but there is still so much more that we must do to help with the medium and long-term northern recovery efforts. It is critical that we receive the help of each and every one of our donors in order for us to reach our target and meet our promise to Israelis that we will support them at this time of great need."

"Besides donating money, I wanted to help in any way I could," explained telethon volunteer Betty Kruger. "While maybe we couldn't be there physically helping the Israelis during the time of the crisis, we can help them rebuild through our donations and helping to collect donations."

Volunteers of all ages are giving their time to UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign telethons. Last week, four nights of telethons raised over $1.2 million for the next phase of the campaign, Project Northern Recovery.

"Those volunteers who have taken the time to come out to the telethons have done an amazing job," said Richard Bennett, co-chair of UJA Federation telethons along with Helen Silverstein. "This year we have dual campaign goals and responsibilities. We also have to ensure that our local needs in the community are fulfilled. We are asking telethon volunteers to come out in full force now to propel Project Northern Recovery."

Toronto helps make history at Ben-Gurion University

By SHARON SCHWARTZMAN
UJA Federation

Although tourists and Israeli citizens alike flock to Eilat for its stunning landscapes, beautiful weather, and relaxing atmosphere, students have been typically unable to afford the academic opportunities of Israel's southernmost city. As a result, Eilat has suffered the loss of young, motivated individuals who would otherwise serve as catalysts for the city's diversity and growth.

But on October 19th, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and UIA Federations Canada made history. At a ceremony held just beside Ben-Gurion University's Eilat campus, representatives from UJA Federation, The Sacta-Rashi Foundation, The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the Eilat Municipality laid the cornerstone for the city's first residential student dormitories.

The dormitory project will provide students of Eilat's higher education institutions with high-quality, low-cost accommodations. The multi-functional building will also accommodate students and volunteers from Toronto and throughout Canada during the summer recess. This will enable a new community of educated, motivated young people to study in Eilat and help the city.

As Eilat mayor Meir Yitzhak Halevi noted, "A university in Eilat with hundreds of students will boost the population. If Eilat becomes a university town with unique academic opportunities, not only will the educational system in the city improve, but it will enhance Eilat's character and status."

Randy Shiff (far right) and Barbara Bank participate in laying the cornerstone for Eilat's first residential student dormitories at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

This project is just another example of the dedication that Toronto's Jewish community, Eilat's partner, has invested in the city and surrounding Eilot region.

"The dream that is being fulfilled today marks the latest chapter in Toronto's commitment to the region," said Orit Braun, JAFI's representative. "The partnership that you have created here in Eilat and the Eilot region sets the standard for all other partnerships in Israel, not only for its extensive investment in education, but in other fields as well."

Toronto Jewry has always demonstrated an active presence in Israel, explained Brian Schachter, co-chair, along with Morley Brown, of UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 Committee. "This partnership is unique for its warm friendship and its close personal ties with the people of the region."

A live-broadcast to the Lipa Green Building, housing the UJA Federation offices, gave Toronto's Jewish community the opportunity to be present at the event and to celebrate, with their friends in Eilat, the realization of their dream.

"We're so lucky to participate in your dreams," said UJA Federation president, Ted Sokolsky.

Holocaust Education Week

November 1 – 9, 2006

From Wednesday, November 1 to Thursday, November 9, Holocaust Education Week (HEW) - the largest Holocaust education program outside of Israel - returns to the Greater Toronto Area for its 26th year.

HEW, sponsored by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation, features over 100 programs, speakers and films to inspire and educate.

According to Holocaust Centre chair, Lorraine Sandler, this year's event is very timely in light of the anti-Israel sentiment pervasive in today's world.

"The recent Hezbollah terrorism perpetrated against Israel, and the vulgar and venomous rhetoric that emanates from Iran, is evocative of vitriol heard in 1938. Our antennae are alert," said Sandler.

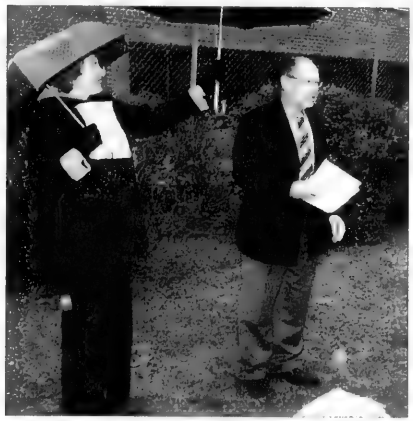
Jewish cemetery declared historic site

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

At one of the oldest cemeteries in Ontario, 75 members of Holy Blossom Temple gathered in the rain late last month to celebrate the rededication of the Pape Avenue Cemetery, and to designate it as a historical site.



From left, Rivanne Sandler and William Draimin addressed Holy Blossom congregants who gathered to witness the rededication of the Pape Avenue Cemetery, which was also designated as a historical site. Below is a tombstone that marks the burial site of a Torah and a Megillat Esther that were damaged beyond repair. [Paul Hellen photos]

As part of the shul's 150th anniversary celebrations, William Draimin and Rivanne Sandler, co-chairs of the Holy Blossom Temple Pape Avenue Cemetery Committee, recently prepared an application to the Ontario Heritage Trust to have the 157-year old graveyard declared an official historical site.

"I don't think any amount of rain can dampen the significance of this wonderful occasion," Draimin told 75 Holy Blossom congregants, who were huddling under umbrellas at the Oct. 22 event.

He said the Pape Avenue Cemetery, which has been under the custodianship of Holy Blossom Temple since 1849, was singled out by the Ontario Heritage Trust as an official historic site, and it will receive a provincial plaque to label it as such.

"This is a special day not only for Holy Blossom, but also for the Jewish community of Greater Toronto. We continue to take great pride in our history and our reputation," Draimin said.

"Soon we will have a blue and gold plaque here commemorating the significance of the first Jewish cemetery."

Sandler explained that when the plot for the cemetery was purchased in 1849, it was the only Jewish burial ground in the area.

"The closest one was in Buffalo, [N.Y., and travel] would have been by horse and buggy," Sandler said.

"It filled a community need for the Jewish population, which was beginning to augment in the 1840s, when Jewish immigrants from Europe began to come to Toronto and other cities in Ontario. It was the efforts of the leading members of the Jewish community who thought it was important to satisfy the communal and religious need, and were responsible for purchasing this land," she said.

Holy Blossom's spiritual leader, Rabbi John Moscowitz, also spoke at the ceremony, and he read a prayer of rededication before Sheila Smolkin, the organizer of the event, unveiled a tombstone that marks the burial site of a Torah and a Megillat Esther that were damaged beyond repair and buried in 2002.

"This cemetery is a special place, a hallowed location to remember special people who are the real pioneers in our Jewish community in both Upper Canada and the province of Ontario," Draimin said.

Minister tries to lure Israeli ex-pats back home

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's minister of absorption, Ze'ev Boim, was in Toronto last week to fulfil a central tenet of Zionism: the ingathering of Jews to Israel.

Boim brought a delegation of officials here to convince Israelis in Canada to return to Israel and thus reverse a growing brain drain.

Sixty per cent of the estimated 700,000 Israelis overseas live in North America. Of these, some 45,000 can be found in Toronto.

"I think we should pay attention to such Israelis," he said in an interview. "We make great efforts in aliyah. Why not reach out to Israelis abroad?"

Toronto was one of several cities in North America visited by Boim – a former mayor of Kiryat Gat – during a hectic 12-day trip.

The other cities on his itinerary were New York, Boston, Miami, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

In every locality, Boim was accompanied by representatives of companies, including Teva and Intel, that have major presences in Israel. In the main, employment opportunities are in hi-tech and engineering.

"The chief consideration for Israelis thinking of going back is jobs," he said.

Asked how many positions are being offered, Boim said, "Thousands."

Thanks to a thriving economy propelled by a high growth rate and increasing foreign investment, Israel is producing a multitude of new jobs.

"The numbers have been very good in the past two years," he observed. "Like China and India."

Boim was particularly interested in luring back Jews from the former Soviet Union who gave up on Israel.

Of the one million Soviet Jews who immigrated to Israel from 1989 onward, 50,000 have returned to their former homes and more than 120,000 have settled in the United States and Canada.

"It's a sad story," he said in reference to Soviet Jewish immigrants who have left Israel. "We failed in absorbing them. We are trying to improve the situation."

Boim decided to launch the current campaign shortly after his appointment last May. He was previously deputy minister of defence.

"This is not a new idea. There are simply too many Israelis living abroad. But until now, we were not really doing anything about it. The time had come to deal with this problem."

Boim said that about 150 Israelis who attended the ministry's workshop and job fair in Toronto, held at the Sheraton Parkway Hotel on Highway 7, showed an interest in returning to Israel.

"I can't predict how many will eventually return, but I hope it will be as many as possible."

Almost 8,000 Israelis, the majority living in North America, returned between 2004 and 2005, according to statistics compiled by the ministry.

"At the end of the day, we can't compete with the United States and Canada," Boim said. "But we hope that the spirit of Israel will persuade Israelis to come back home."

Israel may have to invade border area....please see story page 39.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK
Closing Program

WE REMEMBER AND HONOUR...
Community Commemoration of "Kristallnacht – The Night of Broken Glass"

Thursday, November 9 – 7:30 pm
Shaar Shalom Synagogue
2 Simonston Blvd., Thornhill

Greta Stanton

The year was 1938 and the women swimmers of Hakoah, Europe's largest and most prestigious Jewish sports club, were fast becoming a legend. But, when the Nazis shut down the club, the swimmers were forced to flee Vienna.

Sixty-five years later, film director Yaron Zilberman met the swim team, now scattered around the world, and arranged a reunion in their old swimming pool. The result is the highly-acclaimed documentary Watermarks.

GRETA STANTON, the diving champion featured in the film, and a witness to Kristallnacht in Vienna, will recall her memories of the time and discuss the impact of the film on her and her former teammates, some of whom she had not seen since 1939.

"In Berlin...fire engines stood by to protect the nearby main post office while the Oranienburgstrasse synagogue burned."
Photo – Kristallnacht: the Nazi night of terror by Anthony Read and David Fisher. Published by Random House

The program will also feature a candle-lighting ceremony to commemorate the 68th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the night the stage was set for the "Final Solution" – the annihilation of European Jewry. On November 9-10, 1938, the Nazis organized a massive attack against Jews throughout Germany and Austria. Led by party officials and storm troopers, mobs looted and burned Jewish homes, schools, synagogues and businesses, signaling the beginning of the Holocaust.

Jewish War veterans will also be honoured for their role in World War II.

Relationship between mouth, heart focus of forum

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The University of Toronto Faculty of Dentistry is presenting a public forum called Your Mouth and Your Heart: They Have More in Common Than You Might Suspect.

Dr. Howard Tenenbaum

The forum, which takes place on Wednesday, Nov. 8, at 7 p.m. at the mount Sinai Hospital Auditorium, 18th floor, will explore the link between oral health and general health, with emphasis on the cardiovascular system. It is presented as a service to the community, with no charge to the public.

Keynote speakers are Dr. Howard Tenenbaum, a professor of periodontology and the associate dean of biology and diagnosis sciences at the U of T faculty of dentistry, and Dr. Joseph Minkowitz, a York Region cardiologist who is on staff at Markham Stouffville Hospital.

Whether the format of instruction is a private or a public forum, it is rare to have a forum in which two different disciplines – dentistry and medicine – get to combine their ideas and thoughts.

Minkowitz said he has a passion for teaching patients about their problem "so that they are a partner in improving their health."

He hopes that the general public will walk away from the public forum with a better understanding of gum disease and the causes of heart disease.

Tenenbaum, head of periodontics at Mount Sinai Hospital, said the jury is still out on the links between cardiovascular disease and gum disease "although the evidence is very tantalizing."

From a statistical standpoint, he said the risk of developing cardiovascular disease is increased if one also has periodontal disease.

Speaking of other risk factors in cardiovascular disease, Tenenbaum added that "even if we cannot yet say with any certainty that having periodontitis causes cardiovascular disease, it might indicate that a patient afflicted with periodontitis could be at risk for the development of heart disease and should look towards management of known risk factors for both diseases, particularly smoking."

Minkowitz said risk factors for heart disease are smoking, hypertension, elevated cholesterol, diabetes, family history, and to a lesser extent, obesity.

"Looking for a less-established smoking gun – pun intended – such as gum disease to divert blame as to why a patient has heart disease is a form of denial and obfuscation by the patient," he added.

But the current accepted theory of atherosclerosis beginning as an inflammatory response early in life followed by chronic inflammation and leading to a cycle that results in hardening of arterial vessel and plaque formation cannot be disregarded, he said.

Dr. Joseph Minkowitz

"The initial event which starts the process may in fact be an infection, possibly oral, since it is so common."

He added that there is a high prevalence of gum disease in patients with heart disease and that perhaps the same process – smoking, for example – that leads to atherosclerosis causes gum disease.

"Thus gum disease can be seen as a marker or sign of possible heart disease," Minkowitz said.

COMMUNITY AWARENESS SYMPOSIUM

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 2006

6:30 – 9:00 pm

North York Civic Centre, Council Chambers
5100 Yonge Street, North York, Ontario

HONOURED GUEST & KEYNOTE SPEAKER: PAUL GODFREY

President and CEO of The Toronto Blue Jays, former Chairman of Metropolitan Toronto, former Publisher and CEO of the Toronto Sun

To raise awareness of what services and resources are available in our community – for those who are in need of help – and for those who would like to help.

THE NEED IS URGENT!

- A mother and her daughter share an old pair of winter boots.
- An elderly lady snowbound in her house for several days, doesn't know who to call for help.
- An immigrant who was promised a job before arriving is told, upon arrival, that there is no job.
- A child addicted to drugs roams the streets, with nowhere to go.

United Chesed of Toronto works with over 70 Jewish organizations to help needy Jews in our community. We are a hub for many of the major Jewish agencies, synagogues, Chesed committees and outreach action committees in Toronto.

OMB expected to approve condo project on school land

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The head of a North York ratepayers' association appears resigned to losing a bid to stop construction of a 10-storey condominium building on land owned by an Orthodox Jewish day school in the Bathurst and Finch area.

"There is no question in my mind that the Ontario Municipal Board [OMB] will pass it," said Tom Jutcovitch, president of the Patricia Ratepayers' Association (PRA).

The developer's appeal has been heard by the OMB, which has reserved a decision.

Erection of the 240-unit building on land owned by Eitz Chaim Day School will greatly increase traffic and put the neighbourhood's children at risk, Jutcovitch said.

"The number one concern [of the PRA] has always been the safety of the kids in the street, and not just those from Eitz Chaim. There are too many cars right now, too many kids running across the street and too many parents dropping off their kids," he said.

The PRA has opposed the development for years, arguing the construction plan does not adequately consider the safety of the neighbourhood children.

Construction of the residential building includes parking for 400 cars, which will choke traffic on the narrow street, Jutcovitch said. "We're afraid someone will lose patience and kill a kid crossing the street," he said.

The proposed building was turned down by the North York Community Council and later by Toronto City Council, even after the developer, Vianovus Capital Corporation C/O Cityzen Development, reduced its size to 10 storeys.

The OMB "only looks at the legality of the application," said Ward 10 Councillor Mike Feldman. "The application is within the scheme of things [land use provisions] and the OMB does not see it as that big an issue."

Noting that a building across Bathurst Street is larger than the proposed one, Feldman said he tried to facilitate a compromise on the development, but "the neighbours said 'No, no, no.'"

"I said if we don't do the planning and negotiating, it will go to the OMB."

Feldman said the ratepayers opposed any high-density development and turned down proposed compromises on traffic flow and street widening.

Jutcovitch said the PRA suggested three proposals to mitigate traffic congestion, including reducing the building's size or permitting fewer units. A third suggestion would have limited entry and egress to the building to Bathurst Street.

Feldman said he tried to solve the traffic problem with some innovative suggestions, but they included routing traffic onto Patricia Avenue, which the ratepayers opposed.

As councillor for the ward, Feldman said he has tried his best for the ratepayers' group, but the issue has proven divisive. Some area residents, including parents of children at Eitz Chaim, support the development, he said.

The building will be built on a playground owned by the school and "Eitz Chaim gets paid depending on the density," Feldman said.

"Orthodox power guys came in to see me and push for the deal, as the school needs the money," he added.

Jutcovitch maintained that many Eitz Chaim parents have told him in private they oppose the development, as it will take away an outdoor play area for their children and increase traffic. However, they are remaining silent on the issue.

Jutcovitch was critical of the city for not providing a traffic expert at the OMB hearing to make the case on safety issues. But Feldman said "we couldn't get a credible planner.

"The top five planners did not want to defend opposition to the development," he said.

Representatives of Eitz Chaim were not available for comment at The CJN's deadline.

Innoculating young Muslims against Iranian hate

On Oct. 20, "Jerusalem Day" was celebrated throughout the Islamic world. In yet another rant against Israel and the United States, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad issued an ultimatum that threatened European countries supporting Israel. His threats were widely covered.

The National Post carried Farhad Pouladi's Agence France-Presse story under the headline, "Iranians predict 'triumph of Palestine,'" (October 21).

Reporting from Tehran, Pouladi recalled that Ahmandinejad has termed the Holocaust a myth and has called for Israel to be "wiped off the map," and he cited Ahmadinejad's threats to European countries in particular that might support Israel.

"You should know that any government that stands by the Zionist regime from now on will not see any result but the hatred of the people... The wrath of the region's [Muslim] people is boiling... You should not complain that we did not give a warning. We are saying this explicitly now.

"If a hurricane starts, rest assured that the dimensions of this hurricane will not be limited to the geographic borders of Palestine... This regime [Israel] will take its supporters to the bottom of the swamp."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Globe and Mail editorialized about Ahmadinejad's rant ("Ahmadinejad's routine," Oct. 21). It noted that what makes his threats so chilling is that Iran is in the process of developing nuclear weapons.

The paper called upon the Islamic world to bear the responsibility of speaking out against Ahmadinejad: "If only the Muslim world took some responsibility for insisting that it will not tolerate a clownish leader who preaches hatred against the Jews while complaining of hatred by others. And who uses those complaints of hatred to whip up Islamic fury and to make violent threats against the West. Muslim silence in the face of Mr. Ahmadinejad's foolish rants is highly damaging."

The Globe referred to a recent statement by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak urging Muslims to promote tolerance and speak out against "extremism and radicalism." However, it failed to note the irony that Egypt continues – with only periodic let-ups – to vilify Israel and to promote anti-Semitic stereotypes through its official and semi-official press.

More importantly, Mubarak's cautionary note is a rare occurrence in Arab and Muslim countries and is virtually non-existent, at least on the public level, where Israel is concerned.

In its Oct. 23 editorial, "The enemy of our enemy," the National Post reflected that Ahmadinejad's extremist views have widespread support throughout the Middle East.

"In Gaza, the democratically elected Hamas government refuses to recognize Israel's existence or renounce terrorism. In Lebanon, the euphoria of the 'Cedar Revolution' has given way to an elected government that is dominated by Hezbollah terrorists and their allies. And Iraq's democratic government is controlled by narrow-minded sectarian leaders, many with links to blood-thirsty Islamist militias."

The Post might have added that Tehran currently enjoys more influence in Iraqi affairs than any other single power, and that during Jerusalem Day, reportedly, scores of Iraqis took to the streets in Baghdad and Basra to condemn Israel and demand that Jerusalem "be returned" to Palestinian control.

To be sure, as the Post observes, the governments of Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia are attempting to stand up to the threat of Islamic extremism that imperils their own stability and even survival.

Yet where Israel and Jews are concerned, the record from Saudi Arabia for instance, is far from encouraging. The Saudis are simultaneously attempting to thwart jihadists in their midst while placating Wahhabist extremists by promoting anti-Israel and anti-Jewish rhetoric in the media and madrassas.

Such incitement is infecting the minds of an entire generation of youth, who comprise a large percentage of a burgeoning population spread across a wide area of the globe. Until they are set free from this hatred, there is little chance that moderate Muslims will have any influence against leaders such as Ahmadinejad and his increasingly dangerous like-minded clique of mullahs.

Palestinian media deny Israel's existence: PMW

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The Palestinian Authority, through its media and schoolbooks, has perpetuated the ideology that Israel does not have a right to exist, says Itamar Marcus, director of Palestinian Media Watch.

For 10 years, PMW has been monitoring what Palestinians are saying among themselves in Arabic and to their children. Marcus presented some of its findings to a hushed audience at Kehillat Shaarei Torah on Oct. 22.

Marcus referred to Article 11 in the 1988 Hamas Charter to illustrate the roots of radical Islam in the PA.

"The Islamic Resistance Movement believes that the land of Palestine is an Islamic waqf [trust] consecrated for future Muslim generations until Judgment Day. It, or any part of it, should not be squandered. It, or any part of it, should not be given up," Marcus read.

According to the charter, Israel should be destroyed because God wants Muslims to have it, Marcus said.

Mahmoud Al-Zahar, the co-founder of Hamas, reiterated the ideas found in the charter when he said, "there is no place for the State of Israel on this land."

Marcus said the Palestinian Authority is trying to ensure that children internalize Al-Zahar's sentiments.

Educating children not to believe in Israeli's existence and legitimacy is widely found in schoolbooks, Marcus said. Maps in these schoolbooks depict Palestine as encompassing all of Israel.

"Israel does not exist on the map," he said.

The PA has defended these maps, saying that since there are no final borders on them, they don't represent modern Palestine, but rather Mandatory Palestine, Marcus said on the PMW website.

Since 1998, official Palestinian television has been airing a children's music video that claims Israel stole all the Palestinians' land in 1948, Marcus said.

Itamar Marcus
[Kyle Gordon photo]

"In 1948 they took everything. The names they changed. They changed the names," Marcus read from the lyrics.

"The message Palestinian children are taught is that Jews, according to Allah, stole their land, cities, lakes and deserts. It is a total denial of Israel," he added.

Palestinian TV is also responsible for presenting violence as an ideal in children's programming, Marcus said.

He referred to one children's show that discusses the importance of trees. In one episode, a talking chicken tells the host what he would do if someone chopped down his tree.

"I'll fight him and make a big riot, I'll call the whole world and make a riot. I'll bring AK-47s and the whole world, I'll commit a massacre in front of the house," Marcus recounted, reading from a translation of the Oct. 22, 2004, episode of Tarabisho.

"It teaches that violence is the preferred way to solve conflicts," he said.

This kind of manipulation is designed to increase the number of children on the front lines of conflict, Marcus said.

Mohammad al-Dura, 12, was killed in a crossfire between Israeli troops and Palestinian gunmen in Gaza on Sept. 30, 2000. After his death, Al-Dura became a symbol of shahada, or "death for Allah," Marcus said.

Al-Dura's image was used in a music video designed to encourage children to become child martyrs, he said.

"How sweet is the fragrance of the martyr," Marcus read from the lyrics of the video that aired on Palestinian TV from 2000 to 2003.

The station stopped airing the video in 2003 due to protests from PMW, Marcus said.

But, on June 28, 2006, when an Israeli soldiers was captured and taken to Gaza, it aired the video once again, he said.

"Palestinians realized that if Israel invaded, they would need children to fight. They expected Israel to invade, so they ran the video again," Marcus said.

According to three different public opinion polls, 70 to 80 per cent of Palestinian children aspire to shahada, he said, adding that they've learned that dying for Allah is their life's goal.

Ad campaign turns up possible Nazi suspect

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A last-ditch effort to uncover previously unknown Nazi war criminals has turned up one potential suspect on Canada's West Coast.

The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) revealed last week it has learned of a former SS captain now living on Vancouver Island thanks to a phone call from the man's neighbour.

The name matches one on a list maintained by the SWC and identifies the suspect as participating in atrocities. The former SS officer will be further investigated to determine whether there is sufficient evidence to involve Canadian police, said Leo Adler, the SWC's director of national affairs.

Adler said the name came to light thanks to an advertisement that offered a $10,000 reward for information leading to the conviction of Nazi war crimes suspects. The reward is part of Operation Last Chance, the centre's eponymous effort to bring to justice aging Nazi war criminals before time runs out.

Launched in Europe four years ago, Operation Last Chance has turned up numerous leads – in Hungary, the SWC received 329 calls in the first few weeks – and at least two high profile suspects.

In Hungary, a former army officer is under investigation for murdering a young Budapest Jew in 1944 for not wearing a yellow star. The officer, Charles Zentai, is now believed to be living in Perth, Australia.

In Croatia, Milivoj Asner, the former police chief of Slavonia Pozega, is under investigation. Asner fled to Klagenfurt, Austria, in July 2004 after his wartime role was exposed.

Operation Last Chance was introduced in Canada on June 6 – the anniversary of D-Day – and the ads in support of the campaign ran in late September and early October.

The quarter-page ads cost the SWC almost $4,000 and appeared in six community newspapers serving the German, Polish, Hungarian and Ukrainian communities, among others. Two papers, aimed at the Estonian and Lithuanian communities, turned down the ads, said SWC spokesperson David Eisenstadt.

A representative for the Lithuanian paper said the picture that accompanied the ad – a wartime photo of a Nazi officer preparing to hang a civilian – was too disturbing to run.

Operation Last Chance was introduced in Canada because "Canada has a very poor track record" in bringing war criminals to justice, Adler stated. Since 1994, only 21 cases have been launched.

The ads were placed in the hopes of "flushing out" suspects, but "few are left alive anyway," Adler acknowledged.

"It's a reminder that there is no statute of limitations on these atrocities," he continued. "The terrorists of today have to be made aware, in no uncertain terms, that they will be held responsible for their atrocities. The only way to credibly do so is to prove to them that time will not be their ally and that they will be hunted down, just as Nazi war criminals are being tracked an prosecuted."

Israel has duty to defend itself: MacKay tells Bonds crowd

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel acted within international law in taking "proportionate, measured steps" in defending itself against Hezbollah attacks last summer – and, in fact, had a legal "duty" to protect its citizens, Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay told an appreciative audience at a State of Israel Bonds event last week.

He scoffed at critics who say Canada has departed from its traditional neutrality in the conflict. "This is incredible. Where is the neutral ground between defending oneself and Hezbollah attacks? There is no middle ground."

The event was in honour of businessman and Sephardi community leader Ralph Benatar.

MacKay also stressed that his government supports the Palestinians' right to self-determination and a two-state solution through negotiation, not unilateral action.

While he said he believes Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas genuinely wants to end the violence against Israel, MacKay emphasized that his government will never recognize a Hamas-dominated Palestinian government until Hamas renounces violence, recognizes Israel and adheres to the "road map" peace plan, as well as the Oslo accords and other international agreements.

"Some people have said that Hamas was freely elected and that we should recognize that, but I don't think so… Democracy and terrorism are incompatible and any government, whether elected or not, that is involved in terrorism, does not deserve the support of Canada. And as long as we are in office, Hamas will not get our support."

While Canadian funding to the Palestinian Authority has been suspended, MacKay said Canadian humanitarian aid to the Palestinians continues to get through via multinational arrangements and non-governmental organizations, "which we closely monitor to ensure that none of the funds gets diverted to terrorism."

MacKay noted that there has been a "marked change" in Canada's voting pattern at the United Nations on resolutions concerning Israel. He said Canada will not vote for any resolution that is not "balanced" with regard to Israel.

MacKay stressed that the Harper government is seeking an independent Canadian voice on the international scene. "We will not sit back and wait for others to decide for us."

MacKay also affirmed that Canada and Israel stand together in the fight against terror.

"Canada will not be a base for terrorism, nor will it allow terrorism to proliferate elsewhere."

Montreal Vaad beefs up kashrut supervision

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In the wake of the discovery that repackaged non-kosher chickens were being sold as kosher by a Monsey, N.Y., store, Montreal's main kashrut certifying organization is immediately requiring full-time mashgiachs at all establishments under its supervision that handle meat.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, director of the Vaad Ha'ir, said its mashgiachs will be present at all times at every phase of distribution from the slaughterhouse until the meat is in the hands of consumers, without exception.

The mashgiachs must be employees of the Vaad. Under the existing system, the supervised establishments pay the cost of the mashgiachs to the Vaad, which then pays the mashgiachs directly.

The new rules apply to the 53 establishments processing, selling or serving any meat product, be they wholesalers, retailers, caterers, restaurants or institutions. The rules apply whether the meat is fresh, cooked or otherwise prepared, packaged or not. In addition, their refrigerators and freezers must be sealed with the Vaad's locks, for which only the mashgiachs have keys.

Mashgiachs will be especially alert whenever meat is packed or repackaged, Rabbi Emanuel said.

In September, it was reported that the wholesaler Shevach Meats was stocking its Hatzlocha Grocery in Monsey, home of many ultra-Orthodox Jews, with cheaper, non-kosher chicken that it repackaged and labelled as kosher.

According to Rabbi Menachem Genack, head of kashrut supervision for the Orthodox Union, the fraud came to light after a slaughterhouse realized that Shevach was still selling its product after the slaughterhouse had stopped supplying Shevach. Shevach is supervised by a private rabbi, not the OU, JTA reported.

Rabbi Emanuel said none of the bogus kosher chicken could have reached MK establishments. In addition to the Montreal company Marvid, the kosher chickens approved by the Vaad come from only two outside suppliers: Chai Poultry of Toronto (a mashgiach is present when its products are packaged in Montreal), and Aaron's Rubashkin of Iowa, whose products come here sealed and are not repackaged.

As part of its stricter measures, the Vaad is about to become the first kashrut certifier in North America to use hologram labels that are almost impossible to counterfeit. Expected to arrive in five weeks, these round stickers, which bear the MK logo, will be applied only by the mashgiach to the meat after it has been packaged. The labels contain a numerical code that's only visible with a special reader.

As a temporary measure, until the hologram labels arrive, the MK is supplying its own numbered labels that allow the product to be traced more easily, he said.

Rabbi Emanuel said the great majority of MK establishments already have a full-time mashgiach. A small number have been permitted to operate with a part-time mashgiach because the Vaad was confident that other religious Jews were always present, he said. Their certification had been issued under those conditions.

Mashgiachs to be present at all times

He acknowledged that some places will find increasing the mashgiach's hours a financial hardship and that he has already received complaints. However, he notes that the mashgiachs are expected to share in the work of the establishments and not just be observers, which may reduce the impact, and ultimately how much of the extra coast will be passed on to the consumer.

Rabbi Emanuel acknowledged that a shortage of mashgiachs existed in Montreal before these new measures were put in place. The Vaad is looking to add another five to 10 to the more than 100 mashgiachs already in its employ. It has been advertising for recruits and will train qualified people. (Rabbinical ordination is not a requirement.)

The Vaad is also looking to hire a second roving inspector to visit each establishment weekly unannounced.

The new level of vigilance has been approved by the Rabbinical Council of Montreal, the main association of Orthodox rabbis.

Council president Rabbi Michael Whitman emphasized that the Monsey incident, which is without known precedent, has shaken all observant Jews and been a wake-up call to kashrut organizations.

"We feel we are doing everything in our power to ensure that such a situation [as in Monsey] does not happen here," Rabbi Emanuel said.

Rabbi Whitman added that the new procedures show that the Vaad is not complacent and is prepared to modify the way it does things to safeguard the consumer.

While the new measures are aimed at meat handling, the Vaad is also paying closer attention to cheese and candies which are often bought in bulk and repackaged, Rabbi Emanuel said.

Spotting Nazi-looted art priority for auction houses

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two of the largest auction houses in the world now routinely research the provenance of art consigned with them to ensure that it was not confiscated during the Nazi era.

The heads of restitution at Sotheby's and Christie's said that, as more and more of the hundreds of thousands works of art the Nazis looted throughout Europe come on the market, they are increasingly acting as intermediaries between possessors and claimants.

Lucian Simmons of Sotheby's and Monica Dugot of Christie's, both lawyers by profession and based in New York, said they have had some success in restituting spoliated property without going to court. Reaching a settlement, however, is typically a very delicate and lengthy process, and varies from surrender of the work to the owner and claimant agreeing to sell it.

Simmons and Dugot were panelists at a program titled "Where Did All the Art Go? Reclaiming Works Looted During the Nazi Period" at Concordia University, as part of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's annual education series.

"Today we are checking provenance, in the same way we check condition, authorship and medium. It's part of our everyday life," Simmons said. Both Christie's and Sotheby's generally keep the work until a resolution is found.

Simmons has a team of two full-time lawyers and two art historians, as well as consultants, working on restitution.

Besides being concerned with seeing that justice is done, Simmons said it is "self-preservation" that drives Sotheby's to be so scrupulous in avoiding looted art.

"Sotheby's is very cautious about potential legal exposure, either civil or criminal, varying by country." It's also just good business, because any slip carries the "potential for bad publicity" and, in any case, "nobody would buy [a work] when it is tainted… We are being as paranoid as we can for our own benefit and that of our clients."

There's now a database of 13,000 "sensitive" names that are red flags for possible problems. Research includes checking the work's documentation as far back as possible, and clues on the back of paintings, such as labels and customs stamps. Occasionally, the auctioneers have gone through the Nazis' own records. They also work with the private Art Loss Register based in London, which monitors all sales worldwide, and the Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO), which is part of the New York State Banking Department.

Litigation should be avoided, both panelists said.

"It can be traumatic for the claimant; there's huge financial and emotional costs," said Dugot, adding that it's also complicated because different national jurisdictions may be involved. "Generally speaking, the parties have been reasonable… Often the work was bought in good faith."

One of the biggest cases Simmons has handled was the restoration of a 19th-century Eugene Delacroix painting consigned to Sotheby's in London 3½ years ago. It had belonged to Max Silverberg of Breslau, whose entire major art collection was taken by the Nazis. It took three years, but an out-of-court settlement was reached between the consignors and the Silverberg heirs. The painting sold for more than $2 million (US) in London five months ago.

The vast majority of the looted art is not anywhere near that valuable, and Simmons thinks between 90 to 95 per cent of masterpieces have been restored at least to their original countries, thanks to the effort of the Allies after World War II.

There is always an heir, even if the family was wiped out, he said, adding that it's usually a national or local government.

The recent return of Emile Lecomte-Vernet's Aimee, a Young Egyptian to the Max Stern estate took only a few months after the consignor was informed of its history. The party told Sotheby's, "Please give it back."

The great majority of the works that were sold under duress, seized outright or lost when the owners fled remain unclaimed or even located.

Christie's was involved in the restoration this year of the valuable Herbstsonne painting by Egon Schiele, which was in the confiscated inventory of Viennese art dealer Karl Grunwald. It was discovered by chance after a private French collector brought it into Christie's in Paris for evaluation.

That was a fairly easy case. The possessor had bought the painting without knowledge of its past, but readily returned it to Grunwald's descendants, who are now scattered in the United States, France and Austria.

Also this year a Philips Koninck drawing that had been looted in 1942 from E.J. Otto was discovered to have been confiscated by the Nazis and attempts were made to return it. As Otto has no known heirs, it was decided to entrust the work to the Leo Baeck Institute, with the understanding that if heirs are found, it will go to them.

The third panelist was Sherri North Cohen, a Holocaust claims specialist with the HCPO, which currently has 130 open art claims, some of which – like the Stern collection – include hundreds of works each. To date, her two-person department has overseen 14 settlements.

Its services are available free of charge to anyone, regardless of the value of a claim.

She said her usual method is "moral and ethical persuasion," trying to impress upon the possessor the unjustness of the circumstances under which the work came into the hands of the Nazis, and emphasizing the personal story of the victim.

It can take years.

"It's not easy to try to convince someone to turn over something they may have bought in good faith 20 years ago… There are often two victims in these cases," she said.

Documentary shows IDF battling Hezbollah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — During the recent war in Lebanon, Israeli journalist Itai Anghel accompanied an Israel Defence Forces unit on a night mission into the Lebanese village of Hule.

As the only reporter embedded with the IDF during the war, Anghel, of the respected Israeli news show Uvda (Fact), filmed the mission with a night-vision camera, producing a unique on-the-spot documentary of the battle.

Anghel's video was screened for an Ottawa audience on Oct. 22 by Yaron Deckel, Washington bureau chief for the Israeli Broadcasting Authority and one of Israel's top political commentators.

Deckel, a radio and television journalist who has covered Israeli politics for more than 30 years, has served as guest expert on Israeli politics on various American and Canadian programs and was the first Israeli journalist to be granted an exclusive interview with U.S. President George W. Bush at his Texas ranch.

With little introduction, Deckel screened Anghel's video. At the very beginning, as the soldiers entered Lebanon, the camera turns around to show Israel. The narrator tells the audience that as the soldiers look back at Galilee, to the lights where Israeli civilians live, they know that being in Lebanon, they are protecting their fellow citizens.

The soldiers engaged in dangerous, hand-to-hand battle in and around a couple of buildings, encountering Hezbollah fighters dressed in IDF uniforms. The audience got a taste of the terror, confusion, and intensity of the night mission, and breathed an almost-audible sigh of relief when all the soldiers returned to Israel alive. Several were wounded, but only one seriously.

Having just engaged in fierce battle, the soldiers were then seen visiting their comrades in hospital, embracing and kissing the wounded men.

Deckel told the audience in his commentary after the screening that in the following days, when the unit returned to Lebanon, three of the soldiers in the video were killed.

Deckel summarized the goals, successes and failures of the Lebanon war, providing statistics for how many targets were destroyed and how many Hezbollah fighters were killed, and he concluded that "Hezbollah was damaged severely."

He added, however, that Israel's goals were not all achieved. The two soldiers whose kidnapping started the war are still missing and Hezbollah has not even allowed the Red Cross to visit them, he noted

Also, he pointed out that on the last day of the war, before the ceasefire went into effect, 250 rockets were fired from Lebanon into Israel, "which means that Israel was able to diffuse the long-range missiles, but was not able to deal with all the arms of Hezbollah."

The Middle East is not a safer place as a result of the war, Deckel said. "However, Israel is safer due to the ceasefire… tourism is back, northern Israel is safe again… despite the heavy price Israeli society paid with 4,000 rockets during the 33 days, [Hezbollah] didn't manage to break the Israeli spirit. People were still willing to stay in the shelters as long as would be needed in order to let the soldiers do what had to be done."

Although hopeful that his prediction will prove wrong, Deckel concluded that "unfortunately, most Israelis feel it is only a matter of time before the next round."
